COSMOPOLIS:

A TRI-LINGUAL AND INTERNATIONAL REVIEW.

Price 2s. 6d. EDITED BY F. ORTMANS

The appreciative welcome given to COSMOPOLIS in the course of its first year by the press and the educated public in all countries has satisfied the Editor that this new Review meets a real want on the part of those who would follow closely the development of foreign politics and literature.

COSMOPOLIS offers its readers, in a practical form, the means of keeping themselves in touch with the literary, political, artistic, and scientific movements in foreign countries, and of maintaining or completing their knowledge of the most widely-known European languages.

COSMOPOLIS is composed (in equal parts) of English, French, and German text. Arrangements are now being made for special supplements in which European languages other than those already represented in the Review shall find a place.

In each of the three languages, monthly chroniques or summaries by Mr. Henry Norman, M. F. de Pressensé, and "Ignotus" discuss, from the often divergent English, French, and German points of view, the principal events of current international politics. In other monthly or trimestrial articles, Mr. Andrew Lang, Mr. A. B. Walkley, M. Emile Faguet, Jules Lemaitre, Herren Anton Bettelheim and Otto Neumann-Hofer take note of important literary and dramatic productions of their own country. In addition to these chroniques, annual or bi-annual articles by competent English, French, and German critics will review (from the outsider's standpoint) the various phases of current foreign literature.

COSMOPOLIS publishes every month a short Story in each of the three languages, as well as unpublished Memoirs, Letters, &c.

Space does not permit the mention of more than a few of the distinguished English, American, and Continental Novelists who have contributed to COSMOPOLIS in the course of 1896: Robert Louis Stevenson, Mr. Henry James, P. Maarten-Maartens, "John Oliver Hobbes," Mr. I. Zauggwill, Mrs. W. K. Clifford, Mr. George Gissing; MM. Paul Bourget, Anatole France, "Gyp," Edouard Rod; Herren Paul Heyse, Hermann Sudermann, Mme. Von Ebner-Eschenbach.

In order to give an idea of the interest and variety of the general articles on literature, politics, art, science, and travel which have appeared in the first twelve numbers, we have not space to do more than draw up the following list of some of their Authors: Mr. Oscar Browning, Professor Sidney Colvin, Mme. Darmesteter (Mary Robinson), Professor Dowden, Mr. T. H. S. Escott, Mr. Edmund Gosse, Mr. Frederick Greenwood, Mr. Frederic Harrison, "Vernon Lee," Mr. D. S. MacColl, Mr. Justin McCarthy, Professor J. P. Mahaffy, Professor Max Müller, Mr. George Moore, Mr. G. Bernard Shaw, Mr. George Wyndham; MM. Georges Brandès (who writes in French), J. Chaillet-Bert, Arthur Chuquet, J. J. Jusserand, Gustave Larroumet, Paul Leroy-Beaulieu, A. Mézières, Gustave Monod, Count Léon Tolstoi, M. E. Melchior de Vogué, Charles Yriarte, Mme. Judith Gautier, Lady Blennerhassett, Herren Theodor Barth, Ludwig Brentano, Theodor Fontane, Herman Hefelrich, Max Lenz, Maurus Jokai, Theodor Mommsen, Friedrich Spielhagen, &c. &c.

For forthcoming numbers of the Review we have the pleasure to announce the following new Contributors: Mr. RUDYARD KIPLING, Mr. HUMPHREY WARD, Mr. THOMAS HARDY, Mr. ANTHONY HOPE, MM. EM. ZOLA, FRANÇOIS COPPÉE, PIERRE LOTI, ALPHONSE DAUDET & FULDA, BJORN-TJERNE BJORNSEN, &c.

Extra crown 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

SPEAKER.—"Has long since established its right to be considered one of the most charming books of the charming class to which it belongs. It is because Mr. Bryce, in this supplementary chapter gives us what is, so far as we know, the most precise, connected and complete sketch of the origin and history of the Armenian Question in its modern aspect that we give a double welcome to this new edition of an old friend."

Crown 8vo, 6s.

POPULAR FALLACIES REGARDING BIMETALISM. By Sir ROBERT EDGECUMBE.

JOURNAL OF FINANCE.—"Smites hip and thigh the upholders of the so-called bimetallic currency. The method adopted is a very telling one, consisting as it does of selecting the current phrases made use of by those opposed to the restoration of the joint standard of currency and demonstrating their inherent absurdity.... A clear and convincing style."

Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

RICH and POOR. By Mrs. Bernard Bosanquet.

TIMES.—"The book, though brief, is very thorough, and deals with most of the difficulties of ordinary occurrence."

THIRD EDITION, COMPLETING 30,000.

Margaret Ogilvy.

By her Son, J. M. BARRIE.

With Etched Portrait by MANESSÉ.

Crown 8vo, buckram, 5s.

"It is marvellous with what consummate skill and triumphant ease the author has accomplished his single but most difficult purpose. Without narrative or preliminary disquisition; with never so much as a date or a detail, he has thrown, as it were, upon a white sheet one single image, the image of his mother, who passes rapidly before us, laughing, weeping, anxious, happy, full of household cares and hopes beyond the grave. To be endlessly interesting is the greatest of charms, and it was certainly Margaret Ogilvy's."—Speaker.

"In 'Margaret Ogilvy' everything has been set down, nothing is clouded, nothing concealed, nothing exaggerated. The record is without a jarring passage, and so real is the presentiment that it is hard to believe that it is not fiction."—Academy.

FIFTH THOUSAND.

Charlotte Brontë

AND HER CIRCLE.

By CLEMENT K. SHORTER.

With Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

"Mr. Shorter has done his work so intelligently and so thoroughly that it is hardly possible that there exists in any quarter a scrap of authentic information left for future research."—Saturday Review.

The Land o' the Leal.

By DAVID LYALL.

Crown 8vo, gilt top, 6s.

"The tales are tender and pathetic, permeated with simple religious feeling. The book is a triumphant proof that it is possible to write Scotch stories in a tongue that is understood of persons who dwell on this side of the Tweed."—Times.

LITERATURE IN 1896.

TO be called upon to review, however rapidly, the whole literature of a year is a thing to give the boldest pause. The suggested audacity well-nigh takes the breath away. How, without another Fiat, shall order be evolved out of that chaos, a law and a unity discerned in that weltering mass of books which month after month is poured upon the editorial table? To read all, or a tenth part, even of what may conceivably be worth reading, is far beyond the capacity of any single man, provided, that is to say, he is unwilling to surrender that constant companionship with the masterpieces of the past, which alone can justify the most moderate critical pretensions. And if one does not read it all, who knows but that it may be just the one thing excellent, just the sprouting cotyledonous leaf of genius in the germ, that may give one the slip. The horns of the dilemma are acute. Nevertheless the human mind is curious of generalisations, of drifts and tendencies, of the set of the tidal wave through the criss-cross currents; and, therefore, what can one do but sport the oak, turn one's chair to the fire, and start the hunt after that elusive quarry, the Quo tendimus?

Death has not been so busy among the writers as in some recent years; but, like Tarquinius Superbus, he has cut off the tallest poppies:

"Saepius vento agitur ingens
Pinus; et celsae graviore casu Decidunt turres; feriuntque summos
Fulgura montes."

The loss of William Morris and of Coventry Patmore is no light one for the enfeebled ranks of song to endure. They began life almost as comrades—both were contributors to The Germ—but they diverged to widely opposite poles of social and spiritual outlook. Each, indeed, turned his face resolutely away from the present, but it was to a different past and a different future. Yet we may regret them together, for in The Unknown Eros, as in The Earthly Paradise and in Poems by the Way, there is protest and antidote against some of the corroding evils of our civilisation. Which is, perhaps, as much as to say that both Morris and Patmore were poets. With these, as with Browning, Tennyson, Christina Rossetti, and Stevenson—all in how few years!—we feel there has passed away a glory from the earth, and that the literary landscape is the drearier.

I AM old-fashioned enough to begin my survey of the prospect with poetry. Outcast and disinherited though he be, Apollo is still by courtesy king, and has not yet formally abdicated in favour of that tenth Muse—Aselgeia is her name?—who sways the Amazonian hosts of fiction. And poetry is suffering from the blight of official recognition. After being hawked about the streets for some time, was handed by Lord Salisbury to an amiable poetaster and Ministerial journalist. Since then the Poet Laureate has published a tragedy on Alfred the Great, and has written a set of music-hall verses upon an event which landed the heroes celebrated by our official bard in an official gaol. Under these adverse circumstances the year's harvest of poetry has been a barren one.

"The laurel, greener from the brows

Let us begin with the elder singers. Mr. Swinburne is represented by his Tale of Balen, and if he has not quite recaptured "that first fine careless rapture," he has at least, under the twofold chastening influence of an elaborate stanza-form, and a strict adherence to Malory's text, been able to recover much of the witchery and the music of his earlier and less diffuse days. The New Poems of Miss Rossetti and Stevenson's Songs of Travel come to us as legacies from the tomb. The bulky volume of Juvenilia and other gleanings published in Miss Rossetti's name, though they do not detract from, hardly add to her reputation, while of Stevenson's later verse, as of his Underwoods, one can only say that, delicate as it is in workmanship and fragrant of a most delightful personality, it does not—he never supposed that it did—give him at his best. He moves less easily in the bonds of metre than in his own chosen medium of prose, and though his lovers will always love his rhymes, it is not by these that his fame will endure. Of the living—Mr. George Meredith, Mr. Henley, Mr. Lang, and Mr. Dobson have been silent this long time. From Mr. Bridges we have only an Ode to Music, the stiff libretto of a cantata, and half a dozen lyrics. But it is with the younger men that the interest of poetry at this moment lies. The Siege Perilous of song is vacant and the destined champion tarries. What of the half-dozen aspirants who within the last few years have shown signs of an ambition to achieve the quest? Singers of Fleet-street and of the Rhymers' Club—Mr. John Davidson, Mr. William Watson, Mr. Lionel Johnson, Mr. Le Gallienne, Mr. Yeats: is it one of these who is the destined heir of the ages? or is it Mr. Francis Thompson, in his distant monastery, beyond the way of the fourteen chapels? or is it, maybe, some half-fledged undergraduate, still neglecting his books beside the willows of Isis or of Cam? This year Mr. Thompson, like three at least of his potential rivals, has not said a word; but in the New Ballads of Mr. John Davidson and The Year of Shame of Mr. William Watson we have two volumes by men who have at least made good their claim to be accepted as serious singers. Mr. Davidson, one fancies, has not quite found himself yet. His art is still experimental, and his ethics rebellious: but that he has a good deal in him I am pretty sure; he has the gift of interpreting natural magic, and he has, what is better still, a heart of comprehensive and throbbing humanity. It may be his some day—a less dreamy Morris, an articulate Whitman—to chant the hymn of labour or to fashion the epic of those dumb forces which greatly move the world. About Mr. Watson I am less sure. I joined in the chorus of praise which greeted his Wordsworth's Grave, not really new then, of four years ago. But since then, though he has won continual plaudits, he has surely not advanced. He has been sterile, formal, unsatisfying. This year he has found a genuine motive and a genuine enthusiasm. Morally and politically I sympathise with his attitude on the Eastern Question, as I should with one much more revolutionary. But when one thinks of the Sonnet on the Late Massacre in Piedmont and the Sonnet on the Subjugation of Switzerland, and the Sonnet on the Refusal of Aid between Nations, and of Hellas and of The Halt before Rome, can one really feel that in these Armenian sonnets a great poet has risen to the height of his great argument? Is not the note of warning too often a falsetto, the accent of rebuke too readily strained to vituperation? So far, however, Mr. Watson and Mr. Davidson hold the field; nor are they, it seems, to face the competition of that other sex which, flushed with its conquest over fiction, is still slow to challenge the walls of poetry. Mrs. Meynell's lute is dumb; the talented ladies who write as Michael Field are on the whole in the wrong track; and so, too, is Mrs. Woods in her strenuously Elizabethan Wild Justice, although there are some haunting lyrics in Aeromancy worthy of anything from her earlier volume.

But "there is a new Shepheard late up sprung," who has in him that which may well arouse extravagant expectations. One's first impulse after reading Mr. Kipling's The Seven Seas is to cry aloud at the utter cleverness of the thing. And this is in itself a criticism. But assuredly it is not the ultimate one. Beneath and above the mere cleverness, by interims and conveying gusts, one may discern the rarer and finer qualities. Mr. Kipling, like Mr. Davidson, makes for comprehension. He would bring in much that has hitherto been left out of poetry; much that is stubborn in lending itself to poetry; much that is at first sight common or unclean. He sings of a life robust and unrefined, the life of the pioneers of civilisation, in lands remote. If Mr. Davidson seeks to pierce to a deeper humanity, well, so, too, does Mr. Kipling; but more especially he seeks to embrace a wider humanity. He has wandered with his mate—"the wind that tramps the world." He has found it all good, and would chant a "tribal lay," the lay of the sap of things. Of course he has an uphill task before him. Opening up new fields for poetry is like ploughing the forest primeval: it takes more brawn than goes to a Surrey hillside. Put it in this way. Certain themes have been made classical by the handling of generations of bards; and with these the way even of the second-rate man is clear; he has only to preserve the tradition. The sailing ship—it is Mr. Kipling's illustration—swims itself into verse. But,

"Lord, send a man like Robbie Burns to sing the Song o' Steam."

It needs a man like Robbie Burns to face the difficulty of the thing, to triumph over unromantic associations, to treat the unfamiliar classically, with that complete union of form and matter which we habitually call classical. I do not suggest that Mr. Kipling's ballads of rookies and rankers and derelicts and outcasts are all of them classical; far from it. There is much imperfectly fused ore, much slag and débris in the book. But I suggest that at his best, over the most unpromising material, he does constantly catch the classical accent; and this notably perhaps in parts of McAndrew's Hymn, in The Song of the Banjo, and in a short poem, filled to the brim with tears, Mary, Pity Women.

A WORD now of the minor Minor Poets. poets, who may be the major poets of to-morrow. To these Mr. Elkin Matthews's "Shilling Series" is a great boon. It is such a modest request to be asked to read just thirty-two pages of almost anybody; and Mr. Lawrence Binyon's London Visions or Mr. Stephen Phillips's Christ in Hades would of itself justify the venture. Either of the two may have his career. With the rest it is rather a case of the examination paper in "Q's" famous parody:

"Let twenty pass, 'have a shot at twenty-first,
'Miss Ramoth Gilead, 'take Jehoiakim,
'Let Abner by, and spot Melchisedek."

"Q's" own Poems and Ballads I have not yet had the pleasure of seeing; but I have thought or heard favourably of Mr. A. H. Beesly's Danton, Mrs. Colmore's Poems of Love and Life, and Miss Winifred Lucas's Units; also of two books inspired by the "Celtic Renaissance," Miss Nora Hopper's Under Quicken Boughs and Miss Fiona Macleod's From the Hills of Dream. The lighter quill is sounded in More Echoes from the "Oxford Magazine," wherein only a reasonable proportion of the wit and humour of "Σ." and "A. G." is veiled from the profane in the obscurity of the learned languages.

Old Poets
Reprinted.

If it is a sign of the times, it is a welcome one, that the reprinting of old poets goes on apace. Mr. Henley heads a train of new editors of Byron and of Burns. The "Muses' Library" has been swelled by a Keats, edited by Mr. G. Thorn Drury, and a Henry Vaughan, the Silurist, edited by the present writer, with introductions by Mr. Robert Bridges and Mr. H. C. Beeching respectively. Mr. Ernest Rhys has started a new series, in which Herrick, Campion and others have appeared. Some reprints of Elizabethan Sonnet Cycles by Mrs. Martha Foote Crowe are marred by bad editing. The expiration of copyrights have given us a cheap Mathew Arnold and a cheap Robert Browning. New Shakespeares spring up like mushrooms, and there are rumours of a new Thomas Kyd and a new Beaumont and Fletcher. And new anthologies—always to my mind a most fascinating form of literature—are frequent. There are Mr. Oswald Crawford's Lyrical Verse from Elizabeth to Victoria; and still better, Mr. Churton Collins's Treasury of Minor British Poetry, which in many respects breaks new ground. Less general in their scope are Mr. Henley's A London Garland, Mrs. Sharp's Lyra Celtica, Mr. Buchan's Musa Piscatrix, and Mr. Case's English Epithalamies.

SENTIMENT and tradition lead Fiction. one to put poetry first; but this is not to deny that not poetry but fiction is the characteristic art of the age. It is our nature to express ourselves in the novel, as our Elizabethan forefathers did in the drama; in the novel, not the drama, because the drama requires a concentrated public, and the public of to-day is a diffused public; it is not going to London for its tragedies and comedies, but will have them ready to its hand in its suburban or provincial drawing-rooms. And what an admirable instrument the novel is for our complex modern needs! You may do what you will with it; it has never been formulated; it has no past, of more than a century or so, to concern itself with; it is still young, pliant, responsive to the shaping hand. "Tragedy, comedy, history, pastoral, pastoral-comical, historical-pastoral, tragical-historical, tragical-comical-historical-pastoral"; you may take your choice—the novel will fit them all. In fiction, as in poetry, the lists have this year been open to all comers. Two magnificent fragments remind us of the jousts that have gone. Stevenson's Weir of Hermiston bade fair to be his finest book. The lurid portrait of the grim old judge with which it opens makes us curse the fate which robbed us of a masterpiece. From Stevenson we have also the disappointing Fables. Before the exquisitely carved work of Pater's Gaston de Latour one stands as before some incomplete cathedral fabric of the Middle Ages: it is perfect so far as it goes, and in ten years he might, perhaps, have finished it. Mr. Pater's peculiarly individual manner has left no disciple, unless, indeed, we find one in Mr. Wedmore, whose Organs and Miradou is wrought with much of the same laborious patience, the same delicate loyalty of style. But greater masters of romance than either Pater or Stevenson are still among us. Mr. Meredith, now, I suppose, the acknowledged master of them that go down to Fleet-street in manuscripts, has this year published nothing. But to his Amazing Marriage, which he gave us shortly before the year began, all subsequent fiction has necessarily deferred. It has set a standard, to last until Mr. Meredith writes again. Like Mr. Stevenson, Mr. Meredith has been hailed a classic in his lifetime by the appearance of a comely edition of what Ben Jonson would call his Works. Mr. Hardy, too, has published nothing since he fluttered the doves with Jude the Obscure; and Mr. Gissing is only represented by a short story or so. In the absence of these, the chief honours of the year fall, I think, to Mr. Barrie, whose Sentimental Tommy, though hardly equal to The Little Minister, is a delightful conception, and seems to point to an even more delightful sequel. All honour to Mr. Barrie for his determination not to be intoxicated with success, but, giving himself time, to give us of his utmost. The artistic temperament is less rare at present than the artistic conscience. Another writer, however, who never forgets it is Mr. Henry James, whose return in The Other House from dramas and episodes to his first love, the novel, is a notable event.

The worst of fiction is that it is nearly as susceptible to the gusts of fashion as the width of a sleeve. The successes of one year beget the imitations of the next, and imitation which begins in flattery often ends in discontent. Thus Mr. Barrie bred Mr. Crockett and Mr. Ian Maclaren, and Mr. Crockett and Mr. Ian Maclaren bred satiety; so that, though I do not think that Mr. Barrie's own popularity is much affected, there is a very obvious tendency abroad against the "Kailyard school." Nor can one honestly think that Mr. Crockett's Cleg Kelly and The Grey Man or Mr. Maclaren's Kate Carnegie are exactly the books to stem an ebbing tide. The school of romantic adventure has also lost favour, though not to the same extent. Dr. Conan Doyle's Rodney Stone, Mr. Anthony Hope's The Heart of Princess Osra—Mr.

Hope is, however, markedly overwriting himself—Mr. Lang's A Monk of Fife, and Mr. A. E. W. Mason's The Courtship of Morrice Buckler, have probably enjoyed their full share of readers. The literature of indiscreet revelation, ungrammatical and ill-informed as ever, is still produced, but nobody marks it. We have, I trust, settled down, on the one hand to a saner art, on the other to a sober and serious discussion of those important questions which have recently been so shallowly and wantonly handled. Some even of the sinners show signs of grace. Miss Brooke, the author of A Superfluous Woman, has written Life the Accuser in a chastened mood, and with moments of real, though untrained power. But, of course, the female novel is not, like the female bicycle, an invention for which we have to thank the emancipated woman. From the beginning of things the novel has always been a recognised sphere of women in literature, and there are many to-day who practise a serious art with whose traditions and civilities they are fully in touch. Let us not class them hastily with their rebellious and half-educated sisters. Half-a-dozen one might name from whom one's expectations are always high and rarely disappointed. Mrs. Woods this year comes empty-handed, and Mrs. W. K. Clifford bears only a light load of Mere Stories, but Mrs. Hodgson Burnett has bravely sustained a difficult and artificial theme in A Lady of Quality, and Mrs. Steel's On the Face of the Waters has added to a rapidly growing reputation. Of Mrs. Humphry Ward's Sir George Tressady it is no light praise to say that she has done nothing better since Robert Elsmere, while Lucas Malet in The Carissima is as powerful as ever, and even more brutal. The Herb Moon of John Oliver Hobbes is an interesting experiment in a new method. This clever writer has deliberately waived some of the sparkle and vivacity of her earlier books in order to aim at a more mature and serious delineation of character.

I do not know that I am called upon to enumerate the titles selected by every veteran of the circulating libraries. Sir Walter Besant, Mrs. Oliphant, Mr. Baring Gould, Mr. Black, Mr. Norris, Mr. Marion Crawford—each has a band of faithful admirers, and gratifies them at not infrequent intervals. It is a more pleasing and a more profitable task to take a glance at the promise and the performance of the "coming men." An author's second book is, perhaps, the most critical point in his career, and Mr. Arthur Morrison may congratulate himself that he is so well past the ordeal with his A Child of the Jago. Mr. H. G. Wells, too, was one of the discoveries of yester-year, and though he made, as some think, an unfortunate experiment in his Island of Dr. Moreau, there is enough good stuff in The Wheels of Chance, with its absurd and lovable counter-jumper of a hero, to redeem many a Dr. Moreau. Of newer writers still there are two in whom I am inclined to put some faith. One of them is Mr. Benjamin Swift. Nancy Noon smacks of Mr. Meredith, and though both style and plot would have borne some clarifying, yet there is an uncommon facility about the book and some real imaginative power.

The other is Miss Jane Helen Findlater, whose Green Graves of Balgowrie is one of the most exquisite and tear-compelling stories I have read for many a long day.

So much for a few out of many individual men and women. Upon a more general survey, the chief thing that strikes one, in fiction as in poetry, is the marked tendency towards a great widening of the area of sympathy and observation. Our bookshelves, like our politics, become imperial, almost international. The local extension of the field of fiction is a wide one. Of the part played by Mr. Barrie and other Scotch writers I have already spoken. Ireland is represented among others by Miss Barlow with her Strangers at Lisconnell and by a new writer, Mr. Caldwell Lipsett, whose Where the Atlantic Meets the Land has considerable merit. Of the minor Celtic peoples, Mr. Hall Caine stands for the Isle of Man; Mr. Tirebuck, for Wales; Mr. H. D. Lowry, Mr. J. H. Pearce, and "Q" for Cornwall; Mrs. Wingate Rinder, in The Shadow of Arvor, garners the folk-lore and legends of Brittany. In England itself, besides Mr. Hardy's Wessex, you have Mrs. Francis Blundell working at Lancashire, Mr. A. E. Housman at Salop, in A Shropshire Lad, and Mr. Walter Raymond at Somerset, in Love and a Quiet Life. Beyond the seas, Mr. Parker takes Canada; Mrs. Steel, India; Mr. Hornung, Australia; Mr. Merriman, in The Sowers, Russia; Mr. Crawford, Italy; Mr. Harold Frederic in Illumination, and Mr. Stephen Crane in Maggie, the provincial and the Bowery life of America. Social strata, as well as geographical demarcations, are overleaped. The habits of the so-called "submerged tenth" have never been so minutely studied as by Mr. Morrison, and by Mr. H. W. Nevinson in his Neighbours of Ours. Mr. Wells makes notes upon the shopmen, Miss C. E. Raimond on those Below the Salt. It would, of course, be absurd to talk as if none of these sources of material had ever been utilised for fiction before. Somebody has always been working at one or other of them; but I think it is fair to say that at no other time has fiction been more truly a mirror of our national life, so complex, so adaptable, so infinitely diverse. It is curious to observe that Mr. E. F. Benson, in Limitations, is almost the only novelist of the day who thinks it necessary to give his hero a university training.

To other branches of literature, less vital perhaps than poetry and fiction, critical rather than creative, I can only briefly refer. Want of space and of information prevents me from being exhaustive, and I shall doubtless pass over many books quite as important as those which have caught my attention. There is not much literary criticism of note. The best is perhaps Q's Adventures in Criticism. Mr. Couch writes uncommonly well, and his literary judgments are sensible and acute. Also he is a great and well-informed lover of our early poets. Mr. Gosse, in Critical Kitecats, gossips amiably and egotistically about people he has known. The closing volume of Mr. Craik's Selections from English Prose Writers completes a valuable work. Shakespearian literature is represented by Mr. F. S. Boas's Shakespeare and his Predecessors—a very full and useful introduction to the subject. Mr. Boswell-Stone's Shakespeare's Holinshed is most helpful and crammed with sound learning. Mr. J. P. Yeatman's The Gentle Shakespeare is pretentious and barren. Mr. J. T. T. Brown has offered a knotty subject for discussion in his book on The Authorship of the King's Quair, in which he sets out to show that the usually received attribution of that famous poem to James the First of Scotland is an error. Two of the year's most important books on English writers come to us from abroad. One is the third, and final, instalment of the late Prof. Ten Brink's History of English Literature, the other is a study by M. Émile Legouis on La Jeunesse de William Wordsworth. A Danish scholar, Herr Georg Brandes, has also written a comprehensive book on Shakespeare. This has already appeared in Danish and in German, and will shortly be translated into English.

In that realm of the more liberal essay, whose criticism is of life rather than of letters, Mrs. Meynell is admittedly queen. Her Colour of Life is full of fine observation and delicate irony, and is written with that austere distinction of which she has the secret. There is a tender humour in her study of The Children, though perhaps the child as a literary motive requires something more of spontaneity in the handling. Mr. Kenneth Grahame has this spontaneity, and so has Mr. Canton, whose W. V.: Her Book, is almost worthy of the author of An Invisible Playmate. But with Mrs. Meynell you feel that she observes her children almost as curiously as if they were flowers, and you wonder if they are ever aware of it. Nevertheless she has many quaint and dear innocencies to report. Mr. Crackanthorpe's Vignettes are the deliberate jottings of a highly trained vision. Mrs. Fuller Maitland's The Saltonstall Gazette, good though the idea is, does not repeat all the charm of her Pages from the Day-Book of Bethia Hardacre. Both wisdom and sparkle are in Mr. Zangwill's Without Prejudice and in the At Random of Mr. L. F. Austin, who thus makes his first bow in book form. Mr. G. S. Street's Quales Ego is clever and artificial. The Works of Max Beerbohm are artificial also, with an artificiality that is carefully studied, and that conceals real talent and a serious intention. If I do not mistake, Mr. Beerbohm will astonish us some day.

Works of travel are neither numerous nor important. Nansen's promised book will no doubt cause a sensation. In the meantime Mr. G. N. Curzon has enlightened us on many things in Problems of the Far East, and climbers will find consolation for the winter months in Mr. E. A. Fitzgerald's New Zealand Alps and Mr. Douglas Freshfield's Exploration of the Caucasus. Of much greater merit is Mr. D. G. Hogarth's Wandering Scholar in the Levant, a record of "digging" expeditions in Armenia and elsewhere by an accomplished and witty archæologist.

The most popular form of literature with the populace appears to be biography, and here Mr. Barrie comes to the front again with the beautiful and pathetic memoir of his mother which he calls Margaret Ogilvy. The exquisite personal revelation of this book, and the loving care which has been lavished on its workmanship, make it one of the most attractive of Mr. Barrie's writings. Next to this comes, perhaps, Bishop Creighton's erudite monograph on Queen Elizabeth, while The Frig's Life of Sir Kenelm Digby has also considerable historical value. Mr. Clement Shorter in Charlotte Brontë and her Circle, and Mr. W. C. Hazlitt in The Lambs, have accumulated much new material upon their respective subjects. Captain Egerton Castle's The Jerningham Letters gives an interesting picture of the early days of the century. But the profusion has been of more recent celebrities and nonentities. Mr. E. S. Purcell's Life of Cardinal Manning has given rise to a controversy, vivid and informing, rather than edifying. Mr. Andrew Lang's Life of Lockhart, Mr. Prothero's of Dean Stanley, and Sir Henry Cunningham's of Lord Bowen stand out from the unconsidered rest. A brief enumeration of names is alone possible. Lords Selborne, Blachford and Pembroke, Bishops Magee and Goodwin, Profs. Blackie and Romanes, Dr. Butler (of Shrewsbury), Mr. Madox Brown, General Gordon, Mrs. Kingsford (the anti-vivisectionist), Miss Mary Anderson (the actress)—of all these, and these are by no means all, biographies or autobiographies have been pressed upon us. It is inconceivable how little literary art there is about the methods of the ordinary biographer; his record winds its tedious way through miles of unimportant details and acres of exasperating letters. And yet there is hardly one in the list just given of whom a very few pages would not contain all that the world really cares to know. A notorious instance is the plus-quam-Pepysian garrulity of Mr. A. J. C. Hare's Story of My Life. And after all, the biographies that we read are the old ones. The new editions of Pepys himself, by Mr. H. B. Wheatley; of Boswell's Life of Johnson, by Mr. Augustine Birrell; of Johnson's own Lives of the Poets, by Mr. Arthur Waugh; and of Izaak Walton's Lives, by Mr. Vernon Blackburn, are sufficient proof of this. Old Izaak Walton is in high favour just at present, for besides the Lives one counts at least three new editions of The Compleat Angler.

In the more strictly academic departments of letters there is no great activity manifested just at present. Modern scholarship is very much occupied, on the one hand with turning out school books, on the other with purely technical monographs and with such vast compilations as the New English Dictionary, the Dictionary of National Biography, and the English Dialect Dictionary. From time to time a work of real research, the fruit of learned leisure, appears. Mr. Charles Plummer's admirable edition of the works of the Venerable Bede is a case in point. The philosophers are nearly all experimenting on nerve-processes. The completion of Mr. Herbert Spencer's voluminous System of Synthetic Philosophy, antiquated already before its birth was achieved, deserves a mention. Mr. Gladstone contributes, in all good faith, some studies on the works of Bishop Butler, also, one fears, chiefly of historical interest. More abreast of modern thought are Mr. L. T. Hobhouse's Theory of Knowledge, Mr. Russell's School of Plato, and Mr. Leslie Stephen's Social Rights and Duties. Mrs. Bosanquet's Rich and Poor is an attempt to direct the erratic course of modern philanthropy. An endeavour has been made to thrust upon us for philosophy the egregious speculations of an insane German, by name Nietzsche. From the historians we get little but Major Hume's The Year After the Armada and a volume of Mr. J. H. Wylie's England under Henry the Fourth. Philology yields Prof. Skeat's curious A Student's Pastime. In the realm of classical research Mr. E. F. M. Benecke, in his Antimachus of Colophon, as is not uncommon with young scholars, devotes considerable learning to the maintenance of a paradox, while Mr. A. E. Haigh, in his Tragic Drama of the Greeks, as is not uncommon with elder scholars, devotes learning equally considerable to the exposition of the commonplace. In Mr. Birrell's Duties and Liabilities of Trustees we get that rare bird, an intelligible and amusing law-book.

Have we then found a formula for the literature of the year? If so, it is the formula of comprehensiveness. One can, I think, discern both in poetry and fiction a growing catholicism of taste, a lessening exclusiveness of interest. I have tried to point to some features of this movement. It is, of course, no new one; its tendencies have been gathering strength for many years back; and I believe that it rests upon a genuine broadening and deepening of literary sympathy. And if this new sympathy overflows from letters into life, then poetry and fiction will have done good work for civilisation.

REVIEWS.

A SURVEY OF THOUGHT.

A History of European Thought in the Nineteenth Century. By John Theodore Merz. Vol. I. (William Blackwood & Sons.)

THIS book is one of those painstaking, learned, and "thorough" works which are characteristic of the cultivated Teutonic mind. It is the worthy outcome of the labours of one whose ability has long been known and keenly appreciated in the North of England, as well as his competence in that branch of physical science which he has made specially his own.

The present volume, after an elaborate and interesting introduction, is devoted to depicting the growth of scientific thought in Western Europe during the first half of the nineteenth century. He describes the scientific spirit, as manifested in France, Germany, and England, in three successive chapters; and then two chapters, dealing respectively with the astronomical and atomic views of nature, follow.

The second volume is to consist of similar chapters on the mechanical, physical, biological, statistical, and psychophysical views of nature; and the close of the first part of the work will consist of an endeavour to trace concisely the development of mathematical work in this country.

He tells us (p. 13) that his desire is "to rescue from oblivion that which appears to be our secret property; in the last and dying hour of a remarkable age to throw the light upon the fading outlines of its mental life; to try to trace them, and with the aid of all possible information, gained from the written testimonies or the records of others, to work them into a coherent picture, which may give those who follow some idea of the peculiar manner in which our age looked upon the world and life, how it intellectualised and spiritualised them."

But the author also tells us, in his preface, that the "object" of his book "is philosophical," and, in fact, his laborious account of the progress of science will be succeeded by a statement of his attitude towards metaphysics. We strongly suspect that his attitude of mind towards philosophy will not be found widely divergent, in the conception of its nature, from that of Comte, and that his conception of it is, as it were, a sort of intellectual juice squeezed out from all the physical sciences thrown into a vat and pressed, then drawn off and bottled in vessels of the newest manufacture. However this may be, and however we may feel called upon hereafter to protest against such philosophy, there can be no question as to the value of his statements as to the progress of science. We must, however, avow that the author's style is not engaging, and that his book is rather tedious reading.

In the beginning of his account of the scientific spirit in France it is interesting to note the clearness and netteté of the French mind in its conception of what science is. At the time of the foundation of the Académie des Sciences (1666) the word "science" was already definitely and correctly employed. Then, so far as we know, no man of science was ever called a philosopher, and science and philosophy have never been synonymous—unlike our country where (as Hegel remarked) a thermometer is termed "a philosophical instrument," and where the publications of its chief scientific society are still absurdly called Philosophical Transactions, though no paper on philosophy could ever gain admission to their pages. Cuvier is taken by M. Merz, and very reasonably taken, as the type of the French scientific mind of the earlier part of this century. But as a distinguished expert in chemistry our author's remarks on that science have special value. He represents crystallography as a science which can be claimed by France as almost exclusively her own creation. He says (p. 116)

"that the theory of the Abbé Haüy, who first taught how crystals are built up from small particles of definite and regular geometrical forms, such as cubes, pyramids, &c., came to the aid of the mineralogists, who before him had vainly groped in the dark, searching for some method by which order and system could be introduced into the lifeless forms of nature as by the methods of Linnaeus and Jussieu it had been introduced into the world of animals and plants."

He discusses at considerable length the influence of Napoleon on science, and ends by declaring that but for such glory as fell upon him from Cuvier and Laplace he has scarcely a place in the history of thought. He could hardly have said otherwise.

In his account of science in Germany, our author is, of course, at home. He naturally glories in the eminent physiologists of that country, and gives just tribute to Schleiden, the professor of botany at Jena, who, about 1838, first propounded the cell theory as applied to plants, and to Schwann, who extended it to explain the structure of animals. He also pays just, but by no means exaggerated, homage to that great man John Müller, the veteran founder of German physiology. His school, he declares (p. 197), has the merit of having introduced "exact methods of inquiry, of having established physiological laboratories all over Germany . . . and diffused the true scientific spirit. It boasts of having filled the chairs of medicine, physiology, and anatomy at the German universities with a long list of eminent teachers who have spread the true scientific spirit in every branch of the medical sciences."

In his account of science in England we, of course, at the outset, meet with the honoured names of Black, Herschel, Priestley, Cavendish, Davy, Young, Dalton, Faraday, Brewster, Lyell, and Ball.

The appreciation of English science abroad is made clear by Cuvier's éloge of Sir Joseph Banks in 1821 and the forty years' work of the Royal Society under his presidency. The illustrious Frenchman declared that

"during this period, so memorable in the history of the human mind, Englishmen have taken a part as glorious as that of any other nation in those labours of the intellect which are common to all civilised peoples; they have faced the icy regions of both poles; they have left no corner unvisited in the two oceans; they have increased tenfold the catalogue of the kingdoms of nature; the heavens have been peopled by them with planets, with satellites, with unheard-of phenomena; they have counted, so to speak, the stars of the milky way; if chemistry has assumed a new aspect, the facts which they have furnished have mainly contributed to this change; inflammable air, pure air, phlogisticated air, are due to them; they have discovered how to decompose water; how metals in great numbers are the outcome of their analyses; the nature of the fixed alkali has been demonstrated by none but them; mechanics at their call have worked miracles, and have placed their country above others in nearly every line of manufacture."

Yet it is true to say that the historian of English thought has rather to record the impediments than the aids to progress as regards the public institutions and social customs of our country, there having long been hardly such things as schools of science. This difference between England and the Continent existed in a very marked degree during the early years of the century, but the self-reliance, independent spirit and habit of ready combination so general among Englishmen has more than compensated for the paucity of Government aid to science. On this subject Mr. Merz says (p. 286), speaking of our love for nature:

"We now discover the reason why the strong individualism of the English character, which prompted new departures and inspired new ideas in science, as it produced adventures and novel enterprise in life and arts, has not more frequently led to discouraging failures in the latter, or to eccentricity or dreaminess in the former; why it has on the whole, alike in practical work and in scientific study, been rewarded by signal success. The rare genius gifted with the power of original thought, who found no academy ready to call him, no schools where he could be trained . . . did not retire into the depths of his own consciousness or surround himself with the artificial atmosphere of erudition. The result of such a process can be abundantly traced in other countries and other literatures. In England the isolation from society and the solitariness of genius throw him into the arms of Nature, and she has in many instances—in science, in poetry, and in art—rewarded and refreshed him by a novel aspiration—she has lifted her veil to his loving eye, and revealed to him one of her secrets."

We shall look forward with interest to the continuance of this work, and, above all, to the third volume. It is to be hoped that before its appearance Mr. Merz will have conquered that want of knowledge of, and interest in, Italian culture to which he confesses (p. 15) in his Introduction, although he is fully aware that Italian, Scandinavian, and Russian influences have had much effect on the rest of European thought. The late Prof. Huxley declared that the finest European intellect was the Italian intellect. That Italy has of late played but a subordinate part in European scientific questions is unquestionable. Nevertheless much excellent Italian work in physical science to-day is unduly neglected; and what do we not owe to the Italian physicists, anatomists, and geologists of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries! But it is especially in philosophy that the Italian mind is admirable, and to make Mr. Merz's volume, dealing with philosophy, really valuable it is absolutely necessary that he should acquaint himself with its products.

A MODERN MUSICIAN.

Life and Letters of Sir Charles Hallé. Edited by his Son, C. E. Hallé, and his Daughter, Marie Hallé. With Two Portraits. (Smith, Elder & Co.)

LIKE the playing of Hallé, his "Diary," which covers forty years down to 1860, his "Letters" which date from 1836 to 1894, and his "Notes of Travel" in Australia in 1890, and in South Africa in 1895, are perfectly unexceptional. They are the correctest shade of the pink of all sorts of propriety. You could not get anything more thoroughly respectable than Hallé was as son of devoted parents—the father a musician, the mother an angel—or as lodger (and you may know exactly what he paid for his rooms and what he had for breakfast when he was a youth), or as husband of two wives (the second being Mme. Norman-Neruda), or as father of nine children (eight of them are still living), or as the music-man of Manchester, or as knight, or as Catholic, or as man, unexceptional in every capacity, exceptional in none. There are no surprises about him; you know for certain that he will do, or say, or play the good average thing. He was a music-master of the Princess of Wales, and you are sure he will remark that Her Royal Highness could have made her fortune as a pianoforte player if she had not already made one in the profession of a Princess. And there you have it. "The Princess of Wales," says Mr. C. E. Hallé, "was also a pupil of my father's, and one for whom he had the greatest regard, as her talent was considered by him of a very high order."

In his capacity as model parent, Hallé, in 1862, thought he ought to accept an invitation to dine with the Prinseps "on account of Charles and Watts." We know the result two days later:

"Watts wishes to see everything that Charlie has ever done, as soon as he comes to town, and he promised me that he would give me the best advice he could as to the masters we must give the boy. Therefore bring all his drawings, even if it gives a great deal of trouble; it is very important. Watts highly approves of his having studied anatomy so much this winter. Watts is certainly the man in whom, as an artist, I feel the greatest confidence, and I am very happy that he takes so much interest in Charlie."

This passage, and from the position of the persons mentioned in it, is as interesting as any in letters filling nearly two hundred pages; and it is given to us in two languages—English and French; so are all letters written in French by Hallé, and they are many—all are obligingly translated into English. The musician's earlier letters, written in German, are printed in the English translation only; and we are thankful for that. "What has been the result of the Grosvenor exhibition this season? Has it been satisfactory?" This specimen query occupies a separate paragraph of the large type in a letter from Hallé dated September, 1879. You are not given a reply, not even in a single language! Perhaps the query was printed to show the father's interest in the Gallery of which his son was a director. That is very human and proper; but the editors of this volume have hardly tried to master the broad distinction between memoirs for the family circle and memoirs addressed to the general reader. Well, readers will make the best they can of that. Filial piety is not so common a thing as to go unwelcomed on its own account. And this volume has its distinction in being a monument of that.

But there are two letters in the book which everyone ought to read—one from Browning, and one from Mr. Ruskin, the most delightful letter-writer of his generation. Hallé had played before a girl's school to oblige Mr. Ruskin, who was present. Hallé "was careful to select what was most great and beautiful, and played his very best." This done, a girl asked Hallé to play "Home, Sweet Home," which he did. "To his chagrin, Ruskin, who had been politely appreciative, now became enthusiastic." On hearing later of that chagrin of Hallé's, Mr. Ruskin wrote this letter:

"Winnington Hall, Northwich.
"December 3, 1864.

"DEAR MR. HALLÉ,—My 'children' tell me you were sorry because I liked that 'Home, Sweet Home' better than Beethoven—having expected better sympathy from me. But how could you—with all your knowledge of your art and of men's minds? Believe me, you cannot have sympathy from any untaught person respecting the higher nobleness of composition. If I were with you a year, you could make me feel them—I am quite capable of doing so were I taught—but the utmost you ought ever to hope from a musically illiterate person is honesty and modesty. I do not—should not—expect you to sympathise with me about a bit of Titian, but I know that you would if I had a year's teaching of you, and I know that you would never tell me you liked it, or fancy you liked it, to please me. But I want to tell you, nevertheless, why I liked that 'Home, Sweet Home.' I do not care about the air of it, I have no doubt it is what you say it is—sickly and shallow. But I did care about hearing a million of low notes in perfect cadence and succession of sweetness. I never recognised before so many notes in a given brevity of moment, all sweet and helpful. I have often heard glorious harmonies and inventive and noble succession of harmonies, but I never in all my life heard a variation like that. Also, I had not before been close enough to see your hands, and the invisible velocity was wonderful to me, quite unspeakably, merely as a human power. You must not therefore think I only cared for the bad music, but it is quite true that I don't understand Beethoven, and I fear I never shall have time to learn to do so. Forgive me this scrawl and let me talk with you again some day.—Ever, with sincere regards to Mrs. and Miss Hallé, gratefully and respectfully yours,
"J. RUSKIN."

That letter makes a sort of charter for "musically illiterate" men and women for ever—giving expression with so much grace and humility to what often must have been their thoughts. But how does the musician take these frank words of the man of genius? You have terrible misgivings which are only too literally realised, for you read: "In commenting on this letter my father never would admit that he could not appreciate Titian without instruction." But it was not mere "appreciation" of Titian that was in question—it was such an appreciation as Mr. Ruskin's.

The letter from Browning is dated from the poet's Warwick-crescent house, in the May of 1867:

"MY DEAR HALLÉ,—All thanks for your invitation, which I shall profit by if I possibly can. I want to explain to you why in all probability I shall be away from your music for once; it is foolish, I know. My son goes to college at Michaelmas and has to work so hard in order to matriculate at Balliol, where he wants to go, that he cannot spare even one morning a week, and I have got so used to have him with me that I can't bear sitting alone. Next year, if all goes well with us both, I shall assuredly do the nearly one thing I thoroughly enjoy now.—Ever yours truly,
"ROBERT BROWNING."

This moment of golden-wedding memories can hardly add anything to the affectingness of "I can't bear sitting alone"—a fate

Browning did bear, as a matter of fact, except when his sister sat with him, for the last fifteen years of his life.

Hallé tried his luck in Paris before he tried and got it in London. It was in his Paris rooms in 1839 that he met Wagner, brought thither by their common friend, the breezy Heller. Wagner was then "in great straits"; he "was no pianist," so he could not give Hallé an idea of his compositions, which perhaps was not of great consequence, for "when he spoke of his aspirations it was usually in a strain" which made Hallé wonder if "he was all there." But as an "amiable and lively companion, modest, and full of enthusiasm for all that is beautiful in art," Hallé liked him. Nearly forty years later the two men met again in Bayreuth. "What an immense change had taken place! What a difference there was between the man of 1839 and 1876!" That is the comment of Sir Charles Hallé. Then follows the confession, which, read it how you will, you read sadly: "In after years I met Wagner seldom, and each time found it more difficult to recognise in him the modest, genial young companion I had known so well." Yet if they had talked often, would they really have mingled and communicated? One does not feel very sure: and all other intercourse is barren. On one of their rare meetings Wagner made this remark: "The English are an extraordinary people—still I do not know if they ever arrive at the sigh, without which the aroma of the art does not ascend into space." Sir Charles says of this remark that he "never understood it." It was better so perhaps.

Sir Charles Hallé's work in Manchester was perhaps the most characteristic and important of his life; and certainly, as chance has it, his own powers as a describer are at their highest when he is dealing with this period in his diary, especially in the passages relating to the most hopeless of his would-be pupils. The maiden who omitted minor keys because her father hated them is capably drawn; and as good as anything of the sort ever done is the sketch of the clergyman who came to him in mufti in Manchester with "a list of deficiencies," and whose oddities included a statement that he gave 3fr. 75c. for his gloves, using that currency, as he complacently said, because Hallé "was a Frenchman"! These are bright passages in a book which, as we have indicated, must be reduced in its proportions before it can step out of the rank of memorials prepared for friends, to take its place as a record of a man of merit suited for wide public circulation. That such an extract of the volume before us can be made, and ought to be made, is so apparent that we may suppose it will follow as a matter of course.

"THE BLACK WATCH."

The Record of an Historic Regiment. By Archibald Forbes. (Cassell & Co.)

MR. ARCHIBALD FORBES is not a great writer on war; but he describes passages of the battlefield well, if not with adequate breadth and distinctness; and he is not a fetish worshipper of German success, if he extols, rather unduly, the British soldier. In the work before us he has dwelt on the fortunes of the "Black Watch," an illustrious Highland regiment; and he has found a theme congenial to his peculiar talents. His battle scenes might have been better done. They do not place the drama, as a whole, before us: they are sometimes wanting in true perspective. He has more than once copied the text of other writers. But his narrative is, in the main, excellent; some of his descriptions are very good; his style is always easy, pleasing, and graphic. He has made the most of his subject with laudable industry; and he has produced one of the best of regimental histories.

The "Black Watch" was in its origin a kind of police, composed of bands from loyal Highland clans, and, under the auspices of Duncan Forbes, the mainstay in Scotland of the house of Hanover, employed in keeping the Jacobite Highlands down after the troubles of 1715-19. It was at first merely an array of mountaineers, each of the companies being under a native chief, attended by bodies of retainers; but these—and hence the historic name—were distinguished by the "black" garb which they wore, so different from the "bright" kilts of the tribes of the Celts commemorated in the song of Virgil. It was ere long formed into a regular corps, and saw real war for the first time in 1745, on the field of Fontenoy. Mr. Forbes's account of this famous battle is largely borrowed from that of Carlyle. It might have been more comprehensive and lucid. The "Black Watch" was first engaged in the attack on Vignes; it was then detached to make an effort against the Redoubt D'Eu, the key of Saxe's position on his left; it was afterwards sent to support the Dutch in the attacks on Fontenoy, the French right centre. The men did wonders in this noble but fruitless attempt. "The Highland furies," a French chronicler wrote, "rushed upon us with more violence than ever did the sea driven by a tempest"; and they held the place of honour in covering the retreat. We cannot, however, gather from Mr. Forbes whether the "Black Watch" took part in the memorable advance of the great British column against Saxo's centre, defeated in its attack by the Irish Brigade—the theme of the fine ballad of Thomas Davis. If they did, the sons of the Gael, as has often happened, from the days of Hannibal to those of Napoleon, fought against each other in opposite camps.

Fontenoy was the only European battle in which the "Black Watch" appeared in the field during the strife between England and the old French Monarchy, which fills so large a part of the eighteenth century. The services of the regiment, however, were brilliant across the Atlantic; it distinguished itself in the murderous struggle of Ticanderoga; marched under Amherst upon Montreal, the last passage in the conquest of Canada; won honour in the famous siege of Havana; and joined in several expeditions against the French Antilles. It fought well, too, under Howe, in the American War; but we shall not dwell on a fratricidal contest, which, we devoutly hope, will never be renewed. During the intervals of peace which marked this period the "Black Watch" was much in Ireland, and sometimes in England; but it was not often quartered in the country of its birth, though it always retained its Scottish character, the men and officers being nearly all Highlanders. It had been formed by this time into two battalions, after the customary mode of the British service. They were always remarkable for the strict discipline, the steadiness, and, withal, the impetuous courage which are distinctive excellences of the Scottish soldier. The regiment was engaged in the second year of the war with revolutionary France, in the unfortunate campaign in the Low Countries, and gave proof of its high qualities. Mr. Forbes informs us it was a mere chance that Arthur Wellesley was not on the roll of its officers. The "Black Watch" played a very conspicuous part in the memorable descent on Egypt in 1801. It was a portion of the force which effected the landing, an exploit, Napoleon has written, "of wonderful vigour"; and it covered itself with honour in the hard-fought battle of Alexandria which ere long followed, its struggle with the French "Invincibles" being a glorious passage of arms. Mr. Forbes's description of this fierce conflict is graphic, and even in places brilliant; but he does not place its phases clearly before us; and it makes rather too much of a very doubtful victory. The fact is, the battle was all but drawn: Lanusse ought not to have left his lines; the French attack was badly conducted; and it is untrue that the French were superior in force, thanks to the incapacity of the worthless Ménou. The "Black Watch" shared in the glories of the British Army during the long and memorable Peninsular War, and suffered terribly in the pestilential swamps of Walcheren. It was one of the regiments that formed our right wing at Corunna, and contributed largely to the defeat of Soult, though its services in this respect have in some degree been questioned. Mr. Forbes has taken pains to elucidate the truth; his description of the battle is well worth reading. The regiment followed the victorious march of Wellington from 1810 to 1814, as he fought his way from the Tagus to the Garonne; the second battalion was at Busaco and Fuentes de Onoro; the united corps distinguished itself at Burgos; and it took part in the battles of the Nivelle, of Orthez, of Toulouse. Mr. Forbes has sketched these operations fairly, but with a marked leaning to the successful side; Toulouse was scarcely, in a real sense, a victory, and the attack was made in defiance of the art of war; the stubborn defence, too, of Soult, in 1814, spite of adverse fortune, was very fine, while we justly admire the advance of Wellington, and of the army that "could go anywhere and do anything." The "Black Watch" showed extraordinary steadiness and daring on the bloody day of Quatre Bras; it was caught by Galbois' lancers before it formed square; but it beat the assailants down, though it suffered heavy loss—it was, in truth, so crippled that it was in the last reserve at Waterloo. Mr. Forbes, we may remark, is not carried away by the Wellingtonian legend in the campaign of 1815: he properly blames the Duke's first movements; he sees clearly that had Ney obeyed his orders June 16th would have witnessed the rout of Blücher, and the 17th probably the defeat of his colleague.

During the long peace the "Black Watch" was much engaged, as usual, in service in foreign lands. It gave signal proof that it had not declined in valour and worth on the day of the Alma, the opening scene of the Crimean War. On this occasion it formed part of the Highland Brigade; and, under the admirable leading of Sir Colin Campbell, it defeated a Russian force more than twofold in numbers. Mr. Forbes has described this passage of arms very well: it was the old conflict between line and column, as old as that between legion and phalanx; the extended formation proved superior to the dense mass, probably because it was composed of better and steadier men. The regiment did good service during the great Indian Mutiny; but it would be superfluous to dwell on its easy triumphs, overwhelming as often were the rebels in numbers. More than a century and a half has passed away since the "Black Watch" was enrolled in the British Army; but it has never lost its original type, and it has always displayed the same great qualities. It is, and we hope will always be, one of the most distinguished units of a renowned Army, which, though small in size and not without defects, has scarcely found its equal in the shock of battle, and may fairly be compared to the legions of Rome for its services in all parts of the world.

THE EAST INDIA COMPANY.

Records of the East India Company. Letters received by the East India Company from its Servants in the East. Transcribed from the "Original Correspondence" Series of the India Office Records, with an Introduction, by F. C. Danvers. Vol. I., 1602-1613. (Sampson Low & Co.)

It will be a matter of congratulation among all historical students that at length it will be possible to narrate from original sources the story of the beginnings of the most famous of mercantile companies. The collection of correspondence of which this volume is a first instalment extends, as Mr. Danvers informs us, from 1603 to 1708, and consists principally of letters from the servants of the Company abroad to their superiors at home. The present publication includes the documents relating to the first six voyages made by the Company's ships, and, while, of course, largely occupied with dry technical details of commerce, is by no means lacking in interesting matter.

We must remember that we are removed by a century and a half from the time when the Company even began to aim at political power. Not the slightest dream of territorial sovereignty could as yet have floated before the minds of either principals or subordinates. The earliest voyages, in fact, were not made to the mainland of India at all, but to the spice islands of the Eastern Archipelago. "The earliest document received from abroad by the East India Company of which a transcript is now in existence" is a concession of privileges by the King of Achin, in Sumatra, who declares that:

"In token of our especial friendship and upon many good considerations us moving, and chiefly upon the contemplating of the gracious letters received from the most famous Queen of England, we of our especial mere motion do signify and declare to all people, that we have entertained into our friendship and holy league our well beloved the Sirinissima Reina de Inglaterra, to hold and keep true and faithful league with her according to the commendable course and law of all nations unto whose subjects we wish much felicity, and therefore doth give and grant by these presents for us our heirs and successors as much as in us lieth to the said subjects of the most noble Queen of England, our confederate, and every of them, these articles, grants, and privileges hereafter expressed and declared."

In this quarter, however, the company had to encounter a too powerful European rival:

"The English were overborne in most places by the Dutch, who appear not only to have had at their command greater resources for trade, but were also much superior to the English in those parts, both in the number of their vessels and in the strength of their forces."

Ultimately, after half a century of conflict, frequently breaking out in actual hostilities, the Company seems to have made up its mind to abandon this field to its rivals, and to concentrate its efforts upon India itself.

Even there its first operations were attended with many obstacles. The greatest of Indian rulers, and best of all absolute monarchs, the illustrious Akbar, had passed from the scene of his noble labours a few years before the first English ships appeared on the coasts of the Indian mainland. We cannot fail to regret that the Company was not established a little earlier, and that an intelligent English visitor did not find his way to the Mogul court in the lifetime of the great emperor. Such a one might possibly have been impressed with the spectacle of an enlightened toleration to be witnessed nowhere else in the civilised world, and have reflected on the lamentable contrast presented by the policy of his own sovereigns, though they were not by any means the worst sinners in this respect.

No such feelings of admiration certainly could be excited by Akbar's unworthy son Jehangir, who is the "Great Mogul" of whom we get a few glimpses in this volume. The agents of the Company found it a task of extreme difficulty to transact any business with him; and after he had granted a concession of trading privileges, he thought nothing of speedily withdrawing it. He is described as "fickle," "inconstant," "extremely proud and covetous," "whom the nobles imitate—yea, even in beastliness, &c.; he takes himself to be the greatest monarch in the world, and it standeth not with his greatness to despatch suits speedily." The English believed that his mind was prejudiced against them by Portuguese priests.

"These Jesuits do so bewitch the king with daily presents, as glasses, china dishes, varieties of wine, &c., that nothing is denied them; have way to the king at all times; confer and talk with him; live at his charge; none of his nobles have so easy access; and whom the king graceth they all dare do no other, and whom he respects not no man regards. They shame not to say we are a people rebelled subjects to their king, and make us and the Hollanders as one; they allege, further, our country and prince of no respect and force, having only one city wherein a few merchants, and that our king hath no hand in this business."

The surest path to the Emperor's favour seems to have been to show him some new musical instrument, though even here his preferences were somewhat capricious.

"Lawes and his virginals presented, he played on them, but not esteemed; a bagpipe had been fitter for him. Robert's cornet highly esteemed, the king put it to his mouth, kept it from him, caused six others to be made, but proved not good, would have him serve him; he refused it, affirming to be at his command while he stayed in the country; the king took displeasure thereat, yet he willed him to teach one of his chiefest musicians, to whom he said, if thou canst learn this, I will make thee a great man; but Robert promised nothing for learning him. No Christian here, if not presented by the Jesuits, hath any grace at all. Had Robert Truly been theirs he had, ere this, been a rich man, the king exceedingly delighted to hear his cornet."

Perhaps the most interesting episode in the records contained in this volume is the story of the first English attempt to open up intercourse with Japan. The details are in many ways of a romantic character, being associated with the remarkable history of a Kentish seaman named William Adams, which we have the good fortune to possess from his own pen:

"I am," he tells us, "a Kentish man, born in a town called Jellingham, two English miles from Rochester, one mile from Chatham, where the king's ships do lie, and from the age of twelve years old brought up in Limehouse, near London, being apprentice twelve years to Mr. Niro Diggins and myself have served for master and pilot in Her Majesty's ships, and about eleven or twelve years have served the Worshipful Company of Barbary merchants until the Indian traffic from Holland, which Indian traffic I was desirous to make a little experience of the small knowledge that God had given me; so in the year of our Lord 1598 I was hired for pilot-major of the fleet of five saile, which was made ready by the (Dutch) Indian Company."

The voyage was long and disastrous, and the squadron was dispersed after entering the Pacific Ocean. The vessel in which Adams was, reached the coast of Japan in April, 1600, "with most of her crew sick or dying, and with only half-a-dozen men able to stand on their feet."

The news was soon brought to the court of the Shogun, the hereditary mayor of the palace and commander-in-chief, whom Adams, like all the other early European visitors, styles emperor, and regards as the supreme ruler of the country. The real jure divino sovereign, the Mikado, was so strictly secluded that he is never even mentioned. The Shogun at this time would appear to have been Iyeyasu, the great organiser of Japanese feudalism, and persecutor of the Roman Catholics. Adams was summoned before him, and he inquired

"the reasons of our coming so far. I answered him we were a people that sought friendship with all nations, and to have trade in all countries. He demanded also concerning the wars between the Spaniards and our country, and the reason which he was glad to hear of, as it seemed unto me. So in the end I was commanded to prison, but my lodging was bettered in another place, so that thirty-nine days I was in prison, hearing no more news neither of our ship nor captain, nor of the rest of the company. In which time I looked every day to die, to be crossed, as the custom of justice is in Japan, as hanging is in our land. In which long time of imprisonment the Jesuits and Portugals gave many evidences against me and the rest, that we were thieves and robbers of all nations, and were we suffered to live it should be against the profit of his Highness and of his country. But God that is always merciful at need showed mercy to us, and would not suffer them to have their wills of us. In the end the Emperor gave them an answer that we, as yet, had not done to him nor to his land any harm nor damage; therefore against reason and justice to put us to death; with which they were out of heart that their cruel pretence failed them, for which God be evermore praised. In the end he asked of me if I was desirous to go aboard the ship and see my countrymen. I answered very gladly, the which he bade me do, so I departed and was freed from imprisonment."

Though he was not allowed to return home, Adams rose into great favour with the Shogun, who gave him an estate "like unto a lordship in England." His accounts of Japanese customs and institutions are in general very accurate:

"The people very subject to their governor and superior, also in their religion very zealous or superstitious, having divers sects, but praying all their sects, or the most part, to one saint, which they call Ameda, which they esteem to be their mediator between God and them: all these sects living in friendship one with another, not injuring one another, but everyone as his conscience teacheth."

This passage shows that Adams had obtained a very fair knowledge of Buddhism as it exists in Japan even to the present day. He has rightly described the main object of worship in most of the Japanese sects, Amitabha Buddha, the Infinite Light and Wisdom, whose votaries hope to behold him in the Pure Land of the West. He is hardly, however, correctly described as a mediator; he is rather the Supreme Deity recognised by the most widespread school of Northern Buddhists, the point in which they are most strikingly at variance with the agnostic doctrines of the Southern section.

Adams was anxious to turn his position to the advantage of his countrymen, and as soon as he learned of the formation of the East India Company, he addressed a long communication to them, telling the story of his life and the good opening there was for English commerce in Japan. In 1613 an English ship arrived, and by Adams' influence ample concession of privileges was obtained from the Shogun, and an English factory was established at the harbour of Firando.

Adams might now have obtained permission to return to England, but he decided to remain in Japan, having succeeded in making a good bargain with the Company, by which he became their chief agent in the country. The Dutch had also gained a footing there by his influence, but the English seemed to have started in this quarter with decidedly greater advantages. It is a problem on which the succeeding volume of these records may throw some light how, after having made such a good beginning, the English Company in the course of a few years yielded the field, apparently without a struggle, to its rivals. The land to which the bold Kentish pioneer had shown the way became for nearly two centuries and a half a region hermetically closed against all Europeans but the Dutch. It became, in fact, a subject of mystery and fable almost as Britain did between the departure of the Roman legions and the mission of Augustine. As a grave Byzantine historian could at least half seriously relate concerning a once perfectly well known and flourishing Roman province stories how half the island was uninhabitable by reason of its poisoned air, which nurtured many venomous reptiles, and how the spirits of the dead were ferried over from Gaul to this dreary abode; so the great English satirist of the eighteenth century could without palpable incongruity place Japan in the vicinity of Laputa, Balnibarbi, and other imaginary countries, and in the closest proximity to a land which contained people who never died. In fact at that time it seemed almost as possible for an Englishman to visit one of these fabulous regions as to follow in the track of Adams to the Shogun's court.

POULTON'S DARWIN.

Charles Darwin and the Theory of Natural Selection. By Ed. B. Poulton, M.A., F.R.S., &c. (Cassell.)

PROF. POULTON has written an admirable little book on Darwin and his work. Its style is simple and direct; the matter is well selected and well arranged; there is a due sense of development and of proportion. In one chapter only does Mr. Poulton's judgment appear to be seriously at fault—that containing a series of hitherto unpublished letters to Prof. Meldola. Not that the letters are in themselves uninteresting; one or two might well have been introduced to show Darwin's unfailing courtesy to younger men, and his readiness to render them assistance; but in devoting nearly one-tenth of his space to these letters, the author's usual sense of proportion seems to have deserted him.

The book opens with a chapter on "The Secret of Darwin's Greatness."

"It appears probable," says Mr. Poulton, "that Charles Darwin's unique power was largely due to the inheritance of the imagination of his grandfather, combined with the acute observation of his father. Although he possessed an even larger share of both these qualities than his predecessors, it is probable that he owed more to their co-operation than to the high degree of their development."

Although nothing is here said as to inheritance on the mother's side, this is well put. And if we add, what Darwin himself laid stress upon in a passage from the autobiography which Mr. Poulton quotes, his unbounded patience and industry, we have perhaps as much of the secret as can readily be condensed into a sentence or two. Of course, there was more than this, which may either be summed up in two words—the man—or expanded into his son's three fascinating volumes.

Mr. Poulton gives us a brief, but adequate, account of Darwin's education for the great work of his life, before, during, and after the voyage of the Beagle, and traces the gradual development in his mind of the theory of natural selection. He compares Darwin's section of the joint memoir read before the Linnean Society on July 1, 1858, with that contributed by Mr. A. R. Wallace, and notes how both naturalists owed their inspiration to Malthus.

"There is a tremendous contrast," he says, "between these two discoverers, in the speed with which they respectively developed their ideas on the subject into a shape which satisfied them as suitable for publication. Wallace, after the inspiration which followed his reflections upon Malthus, had 'thought out almost the whole of the theory' in two hours, and in three evenings had completed his essay. Darwin, receiving the same inspiration from the same source, in October, 1838, wrote a brief account of it after four years' reflection and work, and finished a longer account two years later, but was not prepared to give anything to the public until he was compelled to do so fourteen years later, in 1858."

The contrast is still more marked when Darwin's long labours and patient testing of his hypothesis are compared with the obiter dicta of some of his predecessors, of whose momentary flashes of insight Darwin's detractors are wont to make such parade. With characteristic modesty Mr. Wallace has said: "I have not the love of work, experiment, and detail that was so pre-eminent in Darwin, and without which anything I could have written would never have convinced the world." It is idle to discuss the might-have-been; but if we accept Mr. Wallace's candid statement as it stands, we must not forget that his solid and varied contributions to biology amply justify the high position he always held in Darwin's estimation. No episode in the history of science rings more clearly with the note of true greatness than the attitude of these two men, from first to last, with respect to the theory of natural selection.

The reception of this theory, the difficulty with which its central conceptions were understood, and its influence on Darwin's older and younger contemporaries, are sketched with much freshness. A chapter is devoted to Huxley's attitude towards the theory, and the conclusion is reached that, from the first and to the end, "Darwin's bull-dog," as Huxley once styled himself, while whole-hearted in his advocacy of evolution, was cautious and guarded in his utterances concerning natural selection. Many extracts from Huxley's writings are given in justification of this conclusion.

"How far," said Huxley in 1878, "natural, selection' suffices for the production of species remains to be seen. Few can doubt that, if not the whole cause, it is a very important factor in that operation; and that it must play a great part in the sorting out of varieties into those which are transitory and those which are permanent."

This, we take it, was Huxley's consistent position. Natural selection is a potent factor in evolution; whether it is all-sufficient is still sub judice. It is in this sense that we read the passages which Mr. Poulton has brought together. He would seem himself, however, to read them as implying that Huxley advocated suspense of judgment not only as to the range of natural selection, but as to its validity within that range. And so reading them he is not content, but makes profession of a robust faith "in the permanent truth and far-reaching importance of the great theory which has served him [the naturalist] so well." Is there anything here to which Huxley would have demurred? Might he not reply: Agreed! I spoke of natural selection as a very important factor; you speak of its far-reaching importance. So far we are at one. But if you mean that this factor is all-sufficient, I hold that you go further than scientific caution justifies. And thus interpreting him we think that Huxley was right.

For the general reader the interest of the book culminates in the publication of the Origin of Species, its reception and the influence it exercised on biological thought. But naturalists reserve for Darwin's detailed experimental work an admiration scarcely inferior to that with which they regard his great theory. Mr. Poulton deals with the volumes which succeeded the Origin—works teeming with new facts and brilliant generalisations—in as complete a way as the space at his disposal permits; and thus rounds off a piece of work which, in less competent hands, might have been performed in a perfunctory manner, but which, as he presents it, gives evidence of patient care that cannot be too highly commended.

GIL BLAS OF ISPAHAN.

The Adventures of Hajji Baba of Ispahan. By James Morier. Edited by C. J. Wills, M.D. With an Introduction by Major-General Sir Frederic Goldsmid, C.B., K.C.S.I. Illustrated. (Lawrence & Bullen.)

"THOSE things are numbered which we have loved in the short coat and can love again in the long," says the Russian proverb; and we wonder whether the Russian sage who framed it was not thinking especially of books. Books have such a peculiar aptitude for losing their savour with the lapse of time. If there is anybody, of a certain maturity, who does not know what it is to open a book that was perfectly delightful twenty years ago, and find that it has suffered a sea-change into something dull and strange, we offer him our congratulations. But there remain the numbered exceptions, and Hajji Baba is one of them. Hajji Baba was delightful when we were schoolboys, and Hajji Baba is delightful still. For that matter Hajji was delightful when our grandfathers were schoolboys, having been first given to the world in 1823. And does not Sir Walter himself, in the introduction to The Talisman, credit Hajji with "the humour of Le Sage and the ludicrous power of Fielding"?

Hajji Baba is a book to be particularly commended to people longing for a change of air. You leave England on a magic carpet, and are instantly set down in the bazaar at Tehran. It may also be prescribed as a sort of realistic corrective to the romance of the Arabian Nights. It is not by any means a rose-coloured book, but it is decidedly a comfortable book, a book for the traditional long winter evenings by the fireside, "pipe in jaw and grog at elbow." It keeps one in a constant simmer of quiet amusement. Hajji's genial roguery, his frank and ever-ready mendacity, his cheery cynicism, are of the kind to warm a disenchanted heart. One feels that after all, taken in a becoming spirit of unscrupulousness, the world isn't such a dreary place, nor men such bad fellows. And there are no poignant moments to stir one up and tire one. Hajji's adventures never strain the sympathies. Hajji's glory is, not that he never falls, nor yet that he rises every time he falls, but that he always falls on his feet. Even the cruel manner of the death of Zeenab—the damsel who had "made roast meat" of Hajji's heart—affects us but slightly: we shrug our shoulders, and murmur, "Allah Akbar!" And when, at Meshed, Hajji gets the bastinado we console ourselves with the reflection that the bastinado was a good deal less than Hajji merited, and we hope that Hajji's skin was tough. Hajji's offence was the selling of tobacco "adulterated with dung, straw, and decayed leaves." Yes, we think he got off lightly with an application of the bastinado; and anyhow, "Khoda shefa mیدهd"—Allah gives relief.

Hajji as a barber at Ispahan, shaving the heads (if the expression may be allowed to pass) of the big-wigs of the town; Hajji as a captive and accomplice of the Turcoman robbers, pulling the beard of his venerable father; Hajji as a wandering dervish; Hajji as an amateur quack doctor; Hajji as the Lord High Executioner's zealous sub-lieutenant; Hajji as a saint in the sanctuary at Kom; Hajji as curate and matrimonial tout to the Mollah Nadân; Hajji as a Baghdad merchant and a married man; and finally Hajji as a rising attaché in the diplomatic service—in all his various incarnations Hajji is the same merry rascal, the same diverting and instructive comrade. But perhaps we like Hajji best when he is composing his General History of Europe. His observations upon a certain Boonaport, the Shah of the Franciz, as well as those upon a "tribe of infidels called Ingliz, the most unaccountable people on earth, who live in an island and make penknives," are vastly edifying. To be sure, like Gil Blas, his prototype, Hajji in a single lifetime experiences the vicissitudes of twenty, but he preserves his individuality through them all, and the reader's sense of probability is not alarmed. But Hajji's humour is not the humour of Gil. Sir Walter must have writ the word in haste. The unexpected-ness of Gil's humour, the brilliancy of it, the shading of it, the epigrammatic form of it, above all, the broad humanity of it, are not here. James Morier (as a condescending nobleman remarked of Shakespeare) was a clever man; but he was not Alain René Le Sage. However, in its narrower way, Hajji's humour is excellent; and it was not we who started the comparison. Major-Gen. Sir Frederic Goldsmid quotes it in his Introduction, and pats it on the back. For our part, indeed, we will reproach Hajji with but two faults. The first is that circumflex accent over the last letter of his name. It presents no conspicuous charm when we read, and it is a bore to have to put it in when we come to write. The second is his unrelieved cynicism. Even in the East, one would fain hope there are some honest men, some married ladies who do not henpeck their husbands. But all the men in Hajji's chronicle are thievish knaves, and all the khanûms scolds. Hajji's own taste of matrimony was particularly bitter, though his wife's name was Shokerleb ("Sugar-lips"). "Her mouth appeared too small for the volume of words which flowed from it. Her volubility unloosed the tongues of all the other women, until there arose such a tempest of words and screams that I was nearly overwhelmed." This is far from the sort of thing we had dreamed of when we were envying the follower of the Prophet his underûn.

Of the present edition of Hajji Baba the most interesting features are the illustrations. Not those reproduced from Morier's own drawings—they strike us as rather scraggy and unskilful; but those by Persian artists. They are interesting by reason of their matter and by reason of their manner. They give us a vivid sense of Persia as she meets the eye; and we could hug them for their novel treatment of perspective. Dr. Wills had the heart to remonstrate with his illustrator upon this point; but the Persian responded like a man "that all European drawings were incorrect, and that his system of perspective (that of all Orientals) was the correct one." Correct or not, it is extremely entertaining, the figures in the background of a picture being almost always two or three sizes bigger than those to the front. But why, oh why, didn't the editor give us an index of the illustrations? And why did the publishers print the book on such heavy paper? Our arms still ache and our hands are stiff from the labour of holding it.

THE ART OF BOOKBINDING.

Bookbinding in England and France. By W. Y. Fletcher. (Seeley.)

"I OFTEN wonder what the vinters buy one half so precious as the stuff they sell," wrote Fitzgerald's Omar; and a lover of splendid books may wonder in like fashion on what else the beggarly three half-crowns, which this book costs, could be spent to obtain such wondrous value for the money. Seventeen full-page plates (some of them double) in gold and colours, printed as only Messrs. Griggs know how, with forty other pictures, and two most lucid and admirable essays by an expert of eminence, all in a neatly bound volume, for seven and sixpence! It takes one's breath away. True, that the book is only two Portfolio Monographs bound together; and may fail to surprise readers of that amazingly liberal periodical. But even the most greedy book-lover feels ashamed to get so much in return for so little.

It may be a sign of the period that a pastime which, when prices were insignificant, was chiefly confined to the wealthy, should, now they have become prohibitive, appeal to an audience as wide as this popular edition implies. The costly monographs by the same author, to purchase which takes as many guineas as this book shillings, differ from it in degree only. Fact and facsimiles are no less good here; and in this particular context colour printing—too often a thing to shudder at—does more than give you an accurate replica of the books as they appear to-day, it restores their faded livery to its pristine beauty. Herein the habit of English reproduction of leather binding differs from the French. They give you the book as it is now, and record the accidents, the insults, and the blemishes wrought by careless owners. But here we are spared the pang of witnessing mutilation and decay. For fine bindings in the rightful order of their existence should not incur any damage. In well-maintained libraries centuries of lawful use should leave little sign of wear and tear. Therefore it is surely more respectful to the masters who clothed the books we prize, that the ravages of louts, or even the damage by natural causes, should be forgotten, so that we who cannot possess the volumes themselves may gloat on their presentation in all the splendour of their prime.

It is pleasing to find that English binding can hold its own beside that of other nations to-day, even as it has always. For not merely the much belauded volumes wrought by Roger Payne, or by his follower Lewis, whom Mr. Fletcher inclines to rank still higher, but a list of names reaching so far back as the eleventh century supports the claim of the British, who were the first people to issue all volumes bound, and never fell into the ignoble custom of paper wrappers—which still prevails almost everywhere but in England. But the tempting subject of books, historically considered, cannot be touched upon here, else might this monograph suffice to show that national taste has left its mark as distinctly upon bindings as upon buildings. The artistic aspect, however, is set forward by the author in a way that is rare. For your expert, as a rule, cares little for art, and has no word of hope for its future. But in English Bookbindings Mr. Fletcher's last sentence, a quotation from Miss Prideaux's preface to a certain catalogue, runs:

"Binding can never become a fine art unless invention goes hand in hand with the execution, which now leaves nothing to be desired. In all departments of decorative art we see the same inability to escape from the traditions of the past, but in none has there been such servile copying of the old models as in the decoration of books."

To which one feels tempted to add, Well done, Miss Prideaux, and thrice well done, Mr. Fletcher, for endorsing an opinion so utterly opposed to that of the "idiots who rave in enthusiastic tone of every century but this, every country but their own." Excepting that the present tense of Miss Prideaux's warning might be now changed truthfully to the past, it is pertinent and valuable to the last degree. But as the specimens on view in recent years at the New Gallery prove clearly, there is an awakening in most branches of the applied arts, and most certainly in the bookbindings by Messrs. T. J. Cobden-Sanderson, Roger de Coverly, Sir Edward Sullivan, the Misses McColl, Irene Nicholls, and Birkenruth, to name but a few. And this advance is distinctly unlike the fantastic experiments of the latest French school, which have been so prominent in various Parisian exhibitions recently. For the new English binders do not strain after so-called Japanese effects, or employ patchwork of divers leathers, encrusted with all sorts of alien substances, but are content to decorate the sober leather with devices at once new and beautiful. That this view is not patriotic prejudice but simple fact, can be proved by a reference to a recent illustrated article upon French bindings which appeared in The Studio. Even should such evidence as the black-and-white reproduction given therein fail to sustain the charge, a sight of the gaudy books themselves would quickly do so.

Amateurs of the arts who are not specially lovers of binding should not neglect this capital book, and those who are interested technically, should do their best to assure Mr. Fletcher that the genius he hopes "may arise who will be able to unite originality of design with the marvellous accuracy and finish which distinguish the work of the present day," is, most probably, here among us all the time—as those who care to seek may discover for themselves.

AN INVENTORY OF THE PEOPLE.

Life and Labour of the People in London. Vol. VIII. Edited by Charles Booth. (Macmillan & Co.)

MR. CHARLES BOOTH continues his task of giving us an inventory of the people of London from his analyses of the census returns, and the results of his own investigations. He has now reached the eighth volume, which is devoted to the professional classes, to domestic servants, and to the unoccupied section of the community. There are numerous details about the age of the people, their earnings, their social condition, and the statistical treatment is supplemented with some description of each section. The classification is necessarily comprehensive. We find, for instance, that the class "civil and municipal service" is wide enough to include the Lord Chancellor and the Government charwoman; the Lord-Lieutenant and the brokers' man. There are, we learn, 17,643 persons in civil and municipal service. The number is absurdly small considering the multiplicity of public authorities in London, and the army of officials connected with them. The explanation of the apparent underestimate is that many of this class live beyond the metropolitan boundaries, and are therefore outside the census returns and Mr. Booth's book. The same remark applies to the medical section, which includes doctors, dentists, druggists, veterinary surgeons, and nurses—26,508 in all. Of these 15,542 are nurses, but many of the London nurses are outside the London borders, where the great asylums and similar institutions are situated. We would have expected Mr. Booth to have made a note of such points.

The chapter on law contains a description of the undercurrents of the profession. Strangely enough, the neighbourhood of Cursitor-street seems to possess the same characteristics as in the days of Dickens. It will be remembered that Mr. Snagsby, law stationer, had his office in Took's-court, Cursitor-street, and that Mr. Snagsby gave out work to impecunious copyists. He "was giving out a large quantity of work just now," he told Mr. Tulkinghorn when that gentleman called to trace the unknown copyist. So to-day the modern Snagsby does the same, and has his office in the same district. And, as in the great case of Jarndyce v. Jarndyce, the documents must always be copied in a hurry. "Given out Wednesday night, eight o'clock," read Mr. Snagsby from his book, "brought in on the Thursday morning at half after nine." "Solicitors," writes Mr. Booth, "have a fancy for having the documents which they give out over-night copied out and ready for them by the time they reach their office next morning." This undue haste contrasts curiously with the "law's delays," and men have to work all night to satisfy the "solicitors' fancy." We are told that copyists fall off their chairs with sleep, and one "almost put out his eye with his pen." The condition of the copyists has not improved since Snagsby's days, and the middlemen in the business have increased. According to Mr. Booth's investigations there is a hierarchy of middlemen between the solicitor who gives out the document and the man who copies it. At the bottom of the scale are the "Wallerers"—who are generally found leaning against the walls, or hanging round a lamp-post in Cursitor-street. There are two hundred of them in London. The "Wallerers" are the outsiders who only get work when the "sitters" cannot overtake the copying given to them by the "office-keeper" (in whose office they sit), who get it from a law stationer, who has it from a solicitor, who does it for a barrister, behind whom is the unfortunate client who pays for it all.

Turning to another section of Mr. Booth's book, it is pleasant to know that 24,243 people in London are occupied in brightening our lives with "art and amusement." As the list includes 2,000 showmen and 10,000 musicians, among whom are a thousand organ-grinders, the existence of the class is not an unmixed blessing. If we have an army of people catering for our amusements, we are not without facilities for hearing and seeing them. The London theatres, if only half full, would hold 200,000 people a week, and the music-halls can accommodate 800,000 weekly, which means that, on an average, one out of every London family has a "night off" once a week. An attempt is made to reckon the market value of the theatrical profession—from the "super" to the "star." A miscellaneous class under the heading of "Literature and Science" does not invite notice, as the information with regard to the sub-divisions is not very complete. There are no means of arriving at the average earnings of those engaged in literature. The classes occupied in all branches of literature and journalism number 3,211. Teachers, a well-defined class, are 27,561 strong, and 8,597 persons minister to the spiritual needs of the people and receive temporal rewards ranging from nothing up to £5,000 a year. Nearly 400,000 servants attend to our domestic needs. The most formidable of all the classes diagnosed in Mr. Booth's work are the unoccupied masses. They total 1,333,676. Of these 38,609 are "retired from business," 4,577 are pensioners, 90,392 confess that they are guilty of "living on their own means," and students are insulted by being included in the unoccupied list. Over a million are put down first, as "others over ten years," which upon further investigation turn out to be a very mixed lot indeed. They include the inmate of the workhouse and the Member of Parliament, the vagrant and the privy councillor, lunatics and professors. It is only by a process of statistical levelling, therefore, that Mr. Booth arrives at his army of a million and a quarter "unoccupied." There is a huge amount of well-digested information in Mr. Booth's book. The matter is arranged as interestingly as possible, and, while it may not be inviting to the ordinary reader, is valuable to the student of sociology.

"A MOST EXTRAORDINARY YOUNG WOMAN."

The Girlhood of Maria Josepha Holroyd (Lady Stanley of Alderley), recorded in Letters of a Hundred Years Ago, from 1776 to 1796. Edited by J. H. Adeane. (Longmans.)

"LORD SHEFFIELD'S daughter is indeed a most extraordinary young woman." This extract from one of Gibbon's letters, which is quoted on the title-page, is calculated to give the reader a somewhat erroneous impression of the contents of the volume. The last ten years of the eighteenth century brought into a fierce prominence many women whose life records are indelibly stamped on the story of the world's history, but Maria Josepha Holroyd was certainly not one of these. Had it not been for her grandchild, who has so admirably edited her correspondence, her name would probably have been entirely forgotten by the outside world. Her life was spent, it is true, in the midst of alarms, but she was always the one who looked on. She was a typical English girl of her day and generation, and in her letters we have a picture of the ordinary, but far from more-tonous, everyday life of a century ago, which must prove of real historical interest.

Miss Holroyd was certainly gifted with the pen of a very ready writer, and there is not a trace of stiffness or unreality in the whole collection of her correspondence. The unvarying brightness and spontaneity, which are perhaps the most striking features in the volume, show how little she imagined that after many days her letters would become the property of a curious public. The book is interesting and valuable from many points of view: as the unconscious revelation of a charming personality it takes a very high place among the books of the season.

Maria Josepha Holroyd was the daughter of the Lord Sheffield who is chiefly known to posterity as the intimate friend of Gibbon. At a very early age she showed signs of an alarming precocity of intellect. In a letter to her aunt Serena, written at the age of twelve, we find her gravely discussing the demerits of the latest opera, the merits of Mrs. Siddons' acting, and the special attractions of Les Annales de la Vertu. Three years later she gives the following account of her studies:

"In the first place I am reading Les Oeuvres de Dieu, for which I cannot thank you enough. I have never read anything of the sort that was at the same time so amusing and instructive, and where everything is turned to a religious purpose. Sully's Memoirs and Plutarch's Lives I am also reading. . . . I have read, too, Johnson's Lives of the Poets, which interested me very much. . . . Did you ever read Destouche's plays in French? Ten very small duodecimos, and are, I think, very good plays; but my favourite plays are Le Mercier's, who wrote the Tableau de Paris."

This from a girl of fifteen and a hundred years before the advent of a cheap literature!

In 1791 Lord Sheffield and Miss Holroyd started for Lausanne on a visit to Gibbon. The party stopped on the way at Paris, which was then in a perfect ferment of excitement on account of the attempted escape of the King and Queen, and in a number of letters to her aunt and other friends Maria Josepha gives a vivid account of her experiences. It cannot be said that she throws any new light on the much be-written Revolution; but her descriptions are always extremely lively, and help us to form some idea of the way in which the tremendous upheaval struck a disinterested contemporary. In a letter dated July 11, 1791, we get a most graphic account of the ludicrous Fête de Voltaire at which she was present. Mad as the rabble was at that time, it seems almost impossible that any civilised beings could have crammed so much absolutely childish folly into a short ceremony. Our Lord Mayor's show is truly ridiculous enough, but the foolery of the Fête de Voltaire would be sufficient for a dozen of our poor ceremonies.

The party spent a very pleasant time with Gibbon at Lausanne, and it would seem that the historian went out of his way to make himself agreeable. During her stay, Miss Holroyd came in contact with many notable personages, and her account of a visit to M. and Mme. Necker is particularly interesting:

"Mme. Necker," she writes, "is very learned, as you know, and talked a good deal with Mr. Gibbon upon subjects of literature. She is rather a fine woman—much painted, and, when she is not painted, very yellow; but, on the whole, better looking than I expected. Necker is a very vulgar looking man—very like the print of him in The Importance of Religious Opinions. Mme. de Staël was there. She is uglier than Lady K. Douglas; but so lively and entertaining, that you would totally forget in five minutes whether she was handsome or ugly."

The homeward journey across perturbed Europe at a time when preparations for a great war were being made on all sides was full of exciting incidents, which are most graphically set forth. Once arrived at Sheffield Place, the house becomes full of French émigrés, whose somewhat prejudiced interpretations of current events are given in Miss Holroyd's letters to her many friends. It is quite impossible in the space at our disposal to give even a list of the distinguished visitors to Sheffield Place, but special mention must be made of Gibbon, who stayed for a considerable time with Lord Sheffield in 1794. Those who would form an adequate idea of the personality of "le grand Gib," as Miss Holroyd styles him, will greatly enjoy these letters, which abound in intimate touches and genial sarcasms which cannot fail to make the great historian live in the mind of the reader.

In 1796 Maria Josepha Holroyd was married to Mr. Stanley, afterwards Lord Stanley of Alderley, and it would seem that this event put an end to her entertaining correspondence. At any rate, the last letter in this most interesting volume is written a day or two after the wedding.

FROM CROWDED SHELVES.

The World Beautiful. First Series (Gay & Bird), and Second Series (Sampson Low). By Lilian Whiting.

A MORE robust title would have suited these volumes of essays. Unlike many books on the conduct of life, they are instinct with the personality, and fibrous with the experience, of their writer. Miss Whiting does not suppose that one can do lasting good by giving a new twist to the old kaleidoscope of apothegms and anecdotes which is at the service of every library moralist. She writes on the old themes: The Duty of Happiness, Friendship, Social Amenities, Conversation, Success as a Fine Art, Savoir Faire, Finance, and Integrity, and others more profound and spiritual; but she rises above the throng in her treatment of them. It is, indeed, necessary to emphasise her standpoint rather than catalogue her matter. Miss Whiting is clearly of that growing band of men and women who believe that an awakening of the human soul, attended by the acquisition of new psychic powers, already enjoyed by the few, is the gift which the future holds for the children of men. Emerson planted the seeds of this hope in modern minds. Since then it has vitalised itself in many soils. What the new Theosophy is thought to exaggerate in the closet is already proclaimed temperately on the house-tops. It is temperately proclaimed by Miss Whiting. By her the old counsel to struggle is given in new terms, the terms of Emerson: "Our painful labours are unnecessary; there is a better way." In the cultivation and deepening of his spiritual apprehension, and in submitting himself to the operation of the divine energy which will thus be made visible to him, man will henceforth be strong with a measure of the divine strength. Recognising that his fellows, whether they know it or not, are living vessels of the same divine energy, he will consider them in that light, and this conviction will gradually invest all his social relations and feelings with order and sweetness. Not the least remarkable feature of this teaching is the enjoinder of definite mental exercises in the domain of ideal suggestion, and the serene confidence with which speedy moral gain is predicted. Altogether these essays are noteworthy in themselves, and even more so as a sign of the times.

"THE CELTIC LIBRARY": The Shadow of Arvor. By Edith Wingate Rinder. (Patrick Geddes & Colleagues.)

THE so-called Celtic Renaissance has, at any rate, given us some individual books of a remarkable distinction and literary charm. And among these must certainly be reckoned the volume of Breton tales, translations and adaptations, which we owe to Mrs. Wingate Rinder. Some of them are frankly legendary, such as the well-known story of the "Sorcerer and the Menhirs," others are idylls of comparatively modern life within the boundaries of the four bishoprics. There is no incongruity in this. For of all the branches of the Southern, or Brythonic, Celts, the inhabitants of Brittany are outwardly, as well as at heart, the most conservative. In this land of gentle Catholics, customs and superstitions, which in Cornwall and in Wales a harsh and militant form of Protestantism has driven underground, still flourish as they have flourished from immemorial antiquity. It is an old, old country. Unaffected by the Revolution, little affected even by Christianity, primeval beliefs still live, and the Celtic glamour is ever fresh, in the hamlets of Plouhenik and Ploumazeau. We have nothing but praise for the manner in which Mrs. Wingate Rinder has accomplished her task. With all the serious side of the Celtic life, with its inherent poetry and its pervasive melancholy, she is wholly in touch. Her style is exquisite in its restraint and the delicacy of its word-painting. Where vivacity and humour are required, she is, perhaps, less successful. The story of "Devil-May-Care," for instance, would have borne telling with more gusto. Or, better still, it might have been omitted as barely in keeping with the general tone of the collection. Most of the tales chosen belong, in their present form at least, to the period of Christianisation; they are tales of the coming of the saints, of Sant-Ervoan and Santez-Anna of Plounevez-Porzay. The better-known matière de la Bretagne, the group of tales in which the Arthur cycle of romances had its origin, is not represented. The external form of the book is very pleasant, and reflects great credit on those new recruits to the growing company of publishers, Messrs. Patrick Geddes & Colleagues. We could wish that Mrs. Wingate Rinder had indicated to us, however briefly, the sources from which each story was taken. A few notes in an appendix would have been but a small concession for belles lettres to make to scholarship. We desire this the more in that we find the name of M. le Vicomte Hersart de la Villemarqué amongst those of writers to whom Mrs. Wingate Rinder acknowledges indebtedness. Now the legends collected by this pioneer of Celtic research are understood not to be presented in quite their unsophisticated purity.

The Money-Spinner, and Other Character Notes. By Henry Seton Merriman and S. G. Talentyre. (Smith, Elder & Co.)

THIS is not a novel, but a series of character studies reprinted from the pages of the Cornhill Magazine. The authors inform us that "of these sketches, originally intended to be written in collaboration, a minority only are from the pen of H. S. Merriman." If, however, as the sketches stand, they were not written in collaboration, it would perhaps have been fairer to have indicated in some fashion to which author each is due. The book, of course, recalls the innumerable volumes of Characters which form such a marked feature of seventeenth century literature, and of which the most striking are those of Bishop Earle and Sir Thomas Overbury. Mr. W. A. Raleigh, in his admirable monograph on the English novel, has pointed out the part which these collections played in the evolution of fiction as we now know it. Useful as they were in this way, one cannot but feel that at the present day the form is somewhat obsolete. Any one of the studies now before us might pass well enough in the pages of a magazine; but thrown together in a volume they are too obviously the mere raw material of fiction, crude abstractions, standing sorely in need of relief and contrast. Taken by themselves, and viewed simply as notes for subsequent elaboration, they are by no means without merit. They are brightly written and show a certain freshness of observation. The best are, we think, those entitled "The Money-Spinner," "The Nurse," "The Mother," "The Child," "The Spinster." Some of the others are marred by cheap wit and even cheaper pathos.

Scandinavian Folk-Lore: Illustrations of the Traditional Beliefs of the Northern Peoples. Selected and Translated by W. A. Craigie, M.A. (Gardner.)

MR. CRAIGIE describes his book as "an attempt to repeat, with fuller resources, the design of Thorpe in the second volume of his Northern Mythology." Scandinavian folk-lore is unusually rich and well preserved. We have a goodly volume of some 550 pages; nevertheless the compiler complains that in some of the sections he has been unable to do full justice to the wealth of material at his disposal. Mr. Craigie has translated from Icelandic, Faeröese, Danish (including Norwegian), and Swedish sources, drawing alike from the sagas and from the traditions still living in the mouth of the peasantry of to-day. Of course, these stories do not directly represent the primitive Scandinavian belief. Folk-lore may be defined as "forgotten religion." The past appears contorted through the haze of a Christian present, and Thor and Odin are but dim shapes of terror, stripped of their regality. Mr. Craigie has grouped his subject under ten heads: "The Old Gods," "Trolls and Giants," "Berg-folk and Dwarfs," "Elves or Huldu-folk," "Nisses or Brownies," "Water-beings," "Monsters," "Ghosts and Wraiths," "Wizards and Witches," "Churches, Treasures, Plagues." This classification, as he admits, is a somewhat artificial one. Trolls, berg-folk, elves, nisses, brownies, all represent at bottom much the same conception, that of the "hidden folk," the shadowy underground people who sometimes mingle in mortal affairs, the dwellers in Hades. Largely it is a matter of locality. The elf of Iceland is the berg-man of Denmark; and the grim imagination of the Iclander makes his unseen being a giant, while the quieter fancy of the Dane shapes it as a dwarf or a domestic niss. Mr. Craigie has been careful to give the source of each of his stories in the admirable notes. He has done his work excellently, and has made a book which is not only valuable to the student, but also entertaining to the general reader.

The Plant-Lore and Garden-Craft of Shakespeare. By Henry N. Ellacombe, M.A. (Arnold.)

THIS is a new edition of a book which has a well-deserved reputation. Canon Ellacombe is a learned and practical gardener—the garden at Bitton Vicarage is said to be one of the sights of Gloucestershire—and an intimate lover of the old poets. None could be better qualified to illustrate and explain Shakespeare's very numerous allusions to flowers and to gardens. Canon Ellacombe's method is, in his own words, first to "quote every passage in which Shakespeare names the plant or flower"; then to "follow with illustrations (few and short) from contemporary writers; then with any observations that may present themselves in the identification of Shakespeare's plants with their modern representatives, finishing each with anything in the history of, or modern uses of, or cultivation of the plant that I think will interest readers." This scheme is carried out with an abundance of quaint lore drawn largely from the Herbal of John Gerard and the Paradisi in Sole Paradisus Terrestris of John Parkinson. We always regret that our national deification of Shakespeare leads to the isolated treatment of him in such books as this. The Plant-lore and Garden-craft of the Elizabethans would be a more comprehensive, and certainly a more scientific, subject.

POETRY.

A Selection from the Poems of George John Romanes. With an Introduction by T. Herbert Warren. (Longmans, Green, & Co.)

THE poems of Mr. G. J. Romanes have the peculiar interest of being the work of a scientist (word abhorred of Mr. Henley!) who, till almost the last of his life, was a pronounced materialist. They show that even a materialist in science may forget his materialism when he is dealing with warm human loves and sympathies; and they reflect that process of thought by which, in his latter years, he won his way to a higher and more spiritual creed. No man oppressed by the materialism of the age can be indifferent to these indications that even a "scientist" of the higher kind finds the need of an outlet beyond science, and instinctively seeks the aid of a medium which the science-fed man is prone to blaspheme. It is the triumph of Prospero over Caliban. For Caliban, having learned Prospero's language, in these poems does not use it merely to blaspheme. Nothing could be more humble in its sincerity than one of the sonnets expressing the sentiments of the last period of Mr. Romanes' life:

PSALM XXV. 15.

"I ask not for Thy love, O Lord: the days
Can never come when anguish shall atone.
Enough for me were but Thy pity shown
To me as to the stricken sheep that strays,
With ceaseless cry for unforgotten ways.
Oh, lead me back to pastures I have known,
Or find me in the wilderness alone,
And slay me as the hand of mercy slays.

"I ask not for Thy love, nor e'en so much
As for a hope on Thy dear breast to lie;
But be Thou still my Shepherd—still with such Compassion as may melt to such a cry;
That so I hear Thy feet, and feel Thy touch,
And dimly see Thy face ere yet I die."

Songs and Meditations. By Maurice Hewlett. (Constable & Co.)

IN Songs and Meditations Mr. Maurice Hewlett has followed many muses, including Mr. Swinburne's; but to our mind he is never happier than when he follows Spenser. Take these stanzas:

"And now smooth-vestured for delight
In a clear gown of blue and silver white,
She steppeth forth to the green
And pleasant fields; unto her lovely face
The light doth look for food,
That thereon supping he may borrow grace,
And for her sake live clean,
To be a sweet shrine for such maidenhood.

What bridal for what bride
Than sun and open weather
Could be fitter her pride
Whom no man's yoke could tether?
You shall but see together
Her and the south-west wind,
But you shall know her mind
In no man's love to bide.
Bind for her head a crown of crocuses
And for her vest,
More fairy white than snow on upland wolds,
A posy of the flowers she loveth best,
Streak with marsh-marigolds

And shy primroses and pale lady-smock,
Anemones that flock
In woody hollows where the dormice nest.
So in hedge-flowers and young crocuses
Let bosom and brows go drest."

Full as graceful and dainty as this is Mr. Hewlett at his best. His fault is that, like many young poets, he has printed at first too much and too indiscriminately.

From the Hills of Dream. By Fiona Macleod. (Patrick Geddes.)

"CELTIC glamour"—we have all heard of it, and our eyes have desired to see it. Now, mysterious glamour of the truest and highest kind, be it Celtic or otherwise, has this quality: its touch of vagueness is meaningful with a secret which the poet at least feels, if he does not thoroughly grasp; and the secret is there, shut up in aptest words, for whomsoever understands, because he knows. It is otherwise with what goes for glamour in a good many of the verses of the day. Tennyson described them unawares:

"Like a song of little meaning, though the words be strong."

This is the defect of which Miss Fiona Macleod must beware in the poems we owe to a pen that has delighted with its prose. These poems, nevertheless, have a very real spell, a haunting suggestion of a mystery which the writer cannot herself capture, a secret of which she has not the word. Yet the singer, if he have not the secret, should have the word of the secret; even as the old prophets, it is lawful to believe, did not always understand the full meaning of their saying. In such poems as "In the Shadow" we have a certain wild feeling of dim and unrealised romance, which shows that Miss Fiona Macleod has a true spirit of poetry, and no small gift of expression.

IN THE SHADOW.

"Oh, she will have the deep dark heart, for all her face is fair,
As deep and dark as though beneath the shadow of her hair:
For in her hair a spirit dwells that no white spirit is,
And hell is in the hopeless heaven of that lost spirit's kiss.
She has two men within the palm, the hollow of her hand:
She takes their souls and blows them forth
as idle, drifted sand;
And one falls back upon her breast that is his quiet home,
And one goes out into the night and is as wind-blown foam.

* * *

And is there any home for him whose portion is the night?
And is there any peace for him whose doom is endless flight?
O wild sad bird, O wind-spent bird, O bird upon the wave,
There is no home for thee, wild bird, but in the cold sea-grave!"

Despite the touches of genuine fancy in this poem, when all is read we are constrained to ask with Antonio in the "Merchant of Venice": "Is this anything?" Elsewhere we find graphic touches, such as "The curled young bracken unsheath their green claws." And in one set of sonnets

Miss Macleod shows what she can do with a definite idea :

"He loved me, as he said, in every part,
And yet I could not, would not give him all :
Why should a woman forfeit her whole heart,
At bidding of a single shepherd's call ?"

So it begins; and in the next two sonnets is developed the theme of one human being's impotence to be the ruler and stay of another.

II.

"I am thy shepherd, love, that on this hill
Of life shall tend and guard thee evermore.
These were thy words that far-off day, and still Lives on thy echoing lips this bond of yore.
Yet who wert thou, O soul as I am, thus
To take so blithely gage of shepherding ?
Were we not both astray where perilous
Steps might each into the abysmal darkness fling ?

Lo, my tired soul, even as a storm-stayed ewe
Across the heights unto my shepherd cried :
But to the sheltered vale at last I drew,
And laid me weary by thy sleeping side.
Thou didst not hear the shepherd calling us
Nor far the night-wind, vibrant, ominous.

III.

"O shepherd of mine, lord of my little life,
Guard me from knowledge even of the stress :
And if I stray, take heed thou of thy wife,
Errant from mere womanhood's wantonness.
Even as the Lord of Hosts, lo in thy hand,
The hollow of thy hand, my soul support :
Guide this poor derelict back unto the land
And lead me, pilot, to thy sheltering port !
No—no—keep back—away—not now thy kiss :

O shepherd, pilot, wake ! awake ! awake !
The deep must whelm us both ! Hark, the waves hiss,

And as a shaken leaf the land doth shake !
Awake, O shepherding soul, and take command !—

Nay, vain, vain words : how shall he understand ?"

There is more true mastery in this call of a woman on a man to assume towards her the office of a god—unreasonable and most natural—than in the nebulous romance which Miss Macleod chiefly affects. Moaning seas, sighing winds, death-moons, mystical moon-white lands, may mean so much or so little, that they are perilous "properties" for young poets. "Mystery and sadness, sadness and mystery," repeats the youthful rhymers. But this, though an undeniable utterance, will hardly suffice for the stock of a mystical singer. And not to the young poet comes the secret hidden "under the roots of the ocean," the inner vision which takes its stand "there where one centre reconciles all things."

Songs of the Maid. By John Huntley Skrine. (A. Constable & Co.)

THERE is a lot of Mr. Kipling and a little of Mr. Swinburne in the blood of Mr. Skrine. He was prepared at least to receive their message—and that is all to his own credit. He had capacity; and these two authors have given a turn to the production of it. A charming dedication "To My Wife" puts the critic at once on terms of amity with the poet. There is just the note about it that tells you he is a serious person, and one who will not fail you on the next page. Nor does he; for there you have two nice and neat verses to Mr. Andrew Lang by way of introduction to the Songs of the Maid. Need we add that this maid is Joan of Arc, since we have already named Mr. Andrew Lang? We take from the section entitled "The Ocean Throne" some specimen verses of a poem which show Mr. Skrine at his best :

"THE MOTHER AND THE SONS."

"Sons in my gates of the West,
Where the long tides foam in the dark of the pine,
And the cornlands crowd to the dim sky-line,
And wide as the air are the meadows of kine.
What cheer from my gates of the West ?"

And the reply to the mother-land is made—

"Peace in thy gates of the West,
England our mother, and rest ;
In our sounding channels and headlands frore
The hot Norse blood of the Northland hoar
Is lord of the wave as the lords of yore, Guarding the gates of the West.

"But thou, O mother, be strong
In thy seas for a girdle of towers,
Holding thine own from wrong,
Thine own that is ours.
Till the sons that are true of thy bone,
Till the breed of the lion upgrown
In a day not long,
Shall war for our England's own,
For the pride of the ocean throne,
Be strong, O mother, be strong."

Mr. Skrine takes a very respectable place in that department of patriotic poetry in which Mr. Rudyard Kipling's genius creates rivals—but also slays them.

FICTION.

Tom Sawyer, Detective; and Other Tales. By Mark Twain. (Chatto & Windus.)

TOM SAWYER and Huck Finn are by far the most amusing of Mark Twain's creations, and we welcome their return in the story which gives its title to this volume. Tom Sawyer is in particularly good form this time. His ingenuity, his love of a mystery, his noble unwillingness to tell a lie, and the finished art of the lies he does tell, all these find full swing in an astonishing adventure which crowns him and his patient partner with applause and fame. Mark Twain's incidental humour is as fresh and entertaining as ever. Huck Finn, the narrator, has his insight into character :

"It was always nuts for Tom Sawyer—a mystery was. If you'd lay out a mystery and a pie before me and him, you wouldn't have to say, Take your choice; it was a thing that would regulate itself. Because in my nature I have always run to pie, whilst in his nature he has always run to mystery. People are made different. And it is the best way."

In the rest of the volume Mark Twain expounds his idea of how to tell a tale of humour, and also indulges in a little controversy with M. Paul Bourget, whose comments upon America in Outre-Mer appear to have riled his hosts, some. Mark Twain scores some neat points, certainly, but his statement that America has nothing to learn from France in rail-roading, steam-shipping, steamboating, postal service, telegraphy, journalism, magazing, government, religion, morals, or novel-writing! is just a little steep. It almost tempts one to dig up that old-fashioned hatchet of a word, buncombe. On the whole, this is a bright, readable book, with nothing of that detestable tendency to parody the wrong things which we have occasionally regretted in the author. For you can hardly call the amusing skit Adam's Diary a parody of Paradise Lost.

Revenge! By Robert Barr. With Illustrations by Lancelot Speed, Stanley Wood, and E. Manton. (Chatto & Windus.)

THE first thing one is inclined to say about Mr. Robert Barr's collection of short stories is that it is amazing so practised a hand should have wasted so many admirable, suggestive, and tortuous plots on little excursions when they might have served him for long exercises in tale-telling. In some of the very shortest of these stories there are the elements of what was wont to be called a three-volume novel, but the "three-decker" in both services is become, or is becoming, a thing of the past. When one reads farther, however, and especially when one has exhausted the budget, we have only gratitude to utter for Mr. Barr's delightful conduct of the entertainment. He writes with such verve and gusto, his style is so fresh, bright, and occasionally quaint (his practice as "Luke Sharp" of the Detroit Free Press has stood him in good stead), his incidents are so neatly contrived and dovetailed, and his portraiture in the thumb-nail space is so careful and considerable, that one is completely satisfied, as after a good dinner. Carping is silenced and content reigns. All the stories touch nearly or remotely on the subject of revenge, sometimes in the spirit of comedy, more often of tragedy; and some of these latter are sufficiently gruesome, more notably "An Alpine Divorce" and "Which was the Murderer?" "Two Florentine Balconies" is also good of that genre; but it is so full of suggestion that it must stand as one of those that demand fuller treatment for entire satisfaction. But, taking one consideration with another, we prefer Mr. Barr when he wears the comic mask. "Over the Stelvio Pass" is admirable, "A Deal on 'Change'" is delightful, but "The Bromley Gibbets Story" is the thing for our money. It is excellent sport in the way of both character and situation; for we know just such an editor as Shorely of The Weekly Sponge, and such an author as Bromley Gibbets, and his whole game of getting the shifty and indeterminate editor to accept the story of the wholesale murder is in the most mirthful spirit of comedy.

The Circassian. By Morley Roberts and Max Montesole. (Downey.)

WE cannot think that Mr. Morley Roberts has had much to do with the production of this story. He may have supervised the amateur work of Mr. Max Montesole, but even that work of supervision he has done lightly; for The Circassian is marked by none of his notable strength, not to say brutality, of style. But, for all that, the story is one of great vigour and of curious interest—more curious and interesting, perhaps, because of certain touches of awkwardness left apparent in the telling. It purports to be (as the authors declare in an instructive preface) “the narrative of facts gathered from actors in the scenes described, who in almost all cases were known by the names under which they appear,” the scenes being of the famous revolt of Schamyl, the hero of the Caucasus, against the steady encroachments of the Russians upon his native valleys and mountains, and Sarif Ak Karasy being the nominal “hero and chronicler.” The story is remarkable in the absence of the element of Love—in which breach of common observance it follows an eminent example—but it contains marches and counter-marches, spyings and counter-spyings, strategies and ambushes, “battle, murder, and sudden death,” and the smoke of powder and “the smell of hot blood”—all these galore. The narrative bears us along at the highest pitch of excitement, and enthral us with the horrible realism of the steady extermination of a warlike and generous people who refuse to yield, spite of the hopelessness of their cause. Their hopelessness and their dignity in their circumstances of catastrophe are marvellously well suggested. But—and this is the one serious fault of an admirable book—there is too much of this strain; there is no gentler contrast of the people at peace, or about any other occupation than war. We learn that they are savage enough to torture their enemies (they crucify a spy because they believe that that mode of putting him to death will kill his soul also), but we see nothing of the pathos or humanity of their existence, and we hear no softer note than that of war. Yet, we repeat, there is genuine power and picturesque vigour in the book, and we have conveyed to us the wild atmosphere of the mountains and caves and passes of the Promethean Caucasus, and singularly vivid touches even of the Russian camp.

The Devil-Tree of El Dorado: a Romance of British Guiana. By Frank Aubrey. With Illustrations by Leigh Ellis and Fred Hyland. (Hutchinson & Co.)

BEST of all things in this book is the frontispiece of a naked man in mid-air writhing in the grasp of, as it were, half-a-dozen arms of a great octopus; next best is a very spirited and sufficiently well-written preface, entitled (with defiant timeliness, or timely defiance) “Shall Roraima (pronounced Roreema) be given up to Venezuela?” and least good of all is the story. The Venezuelan question appears to be settled, and so (it would seem) Mr. Frank Aubrey’s eloquent and picturesque plea is published too late to help to determine the Venezuelan boundary either on this side or on that of the wonderful Roraima. And what is Roraima? Roraima is one of the few wonders of the world—perhaps, truly, the only one—left unexplored. It is a mountain that rises sheer on all sides for two or three thousand feet from the plain, insomuch that travellers who have seen it declare it is inaccessible save by balloon. No man knows what is on the top of it, and no Indian will approach it; but all men know that the plain from which it rises was in distant ages an inland sea, and Mr. Frank Aubrey (and others) guess that Roraima, once an island, now a mountain, carries on its top the famous or fabled golden city of Manoa, or El Dorado, in search of which Sir Walter Raleigh forfeited his fame and his life. Here—in the exploration of this extraordinary mountain and the discovery of the Golden City—Mr. Frank Aubrey had an excellent opportunity, but, alas! he has squandered it; he has invented, too, many effects which ought to have been notable, impressive, and dazzling, but he has humbly given them away with both hands, as not knowing what to do with them. So that the city of Manoa becomes a thing of scoffing, and his people show as poor stuffed figures—even the kings, priests, and princesses among them—while the rest are the most inadequate and handless of supers. But there is one gigantic and heroic stage creation, and that is the carnivorous Devil-Tree, concerning whose gross and obscene appetite it would be wise not to read just before bedtime. Mr. Frank Aubrey, of course, cannot help being an exceedingly raw amateur at story-telling; but it is enough to make Mr. Rider Haggard weep to think what a romance might have been made of The Devil-Tree.

A Tale of the Thames. By J. Ashby-Sterry. (Bliss, Sands & Co.)

Two young men, Guy Stillmere and Ralph Claymer, set out for a midsummer trip down the Thames from Trewsbury Mead to Chertsey. Ere long they fall in with a party containing a Dora and a Phyllis, and for the rest of their journey pursue the devious paths of flirtation with the usual result. Mr. Ashby-Sterry is in his element with such a theme. The acknowledged laureate of the river, he is intimate with every reach and backwater of it, and many a rowing party might do worse than take this volume in place of a more formal guide-book. Mr. Ashby-Sterry’s notion of “riverain” delights, as he calls them, is somewhat a luxurious one. It includes softly cushioned punts and bottles with gold foil on them, and a good deal of pouting and be-ribboned muslin. Also a house-boat at intervals, with a man and a maid to attend on it. It is a matter of taste. Personally, we prefer our oldest clothes and the absence of menials. But, no doubt, for those who like that kind of thing Mr. Ashby-Sterry describes just the kind of thing they would like. And on feminine frills and chiffons, as well as on the composition of “riverain” drinks, his knowledge is extensive and peculiar. This is the sort of book to read with pleasure in punt or canoe. The story is not much in itself—it is not meant to be; but it is prettily written, and interspersed with dainty snatches of the lightest verse. Some of these appear to be Mr. Ashby-Sterry’s own, others are by that kindred spirit, the late Mortimer Collins.

FROM A READER’S NOTE-BOOK.

IT is impossible to agree with those who try to persuade us that the oblivion which has so rapidly overtaken much of Anthony Trollope’s work is undeserved. There may be truth in the assertion that in the sixties and seventies a new novel by Trollope was “quite a literary event.” That, indeed, is my own recollection. I think, however, it merely goes to show that, setting aside their half-a-dozen giants, those two decades were weak in fiction. We have not a Dickens or Thackeray or George Eliot to-day, but we can boast dozens of readable novelists. Moreover, the general standard seems higher. Hundreds of the library books issued in the seventies would never find a publisher now. I doubt also whether the enlightened contemporary reviewer invited to pass judgment on any one of Trollope’s later novels would find its publication “an event” of any sort. Nevertheless, there are Trollopes which none of us would willingly have missed, and which will always be interesting as accurate pictures of the clerical, county, and middle-class society of the time. Standing before the shelves bearing the forty-five stout, and often alarmingly long, novels which this too fertile and facile writer produced between 1847 and 1879, I do not wonder the neophyte quails. If, however, he wisely selects the slimmest of all, The Warden, and becomes sufficiently interested to follow it up with Barchester Towers and Last Chronicles of Barchester, an inclination to undergo a course of Trollope may not impossibly supervene. In that case, passing by The Three Clerks, The Bertrams, and the other earlier efforts, the first stop should be at Dr. Thorne, following that with Framley Parsonage. The Small House at Allington, Can You Forgive Her? and He Knew He was Right are far too lengthy for any ordinary appetite, though I must confess I read the even more solid Orley Farm with considerable enjoyment. Phineas Finn was a great success, and the first of an interesting series of political novels. Its sequel, Phineas Redux, may be left alone. Of the later stories, The Eustace Diamonds and The Prime Minister are the best. Of the whole forty-five novels those comprising The Chronicles of Barchester alone seem to possess vitality.

There being practically no new books at this season I append the names of the six novels which I consider have proved the popular successes of 1896:

THE BAD CHILD'S REWARD.*

A NEW book of good nonsense is as rare as the visits of angels, and hardly less welcome. For the production of good nonsense is a fine art, the masters of which can be counted on the fingers; and to-day—Edward Lear having passed from the land to whose stores of fun he added so much, and Lewis Carroll having become silent or mathematical, though a classic in his own lifetime—we seemed likely to be without a true artist in the craft until H. B. appeared hand in hand with B. T. B., and laid The Bad Child's Book of Beasts very modestly before the readers of England. Indeed, so quiet and unobtrusive was their little book's entry that many persons who like literature to be not too serious, and who are eager for such a work, have not yet heard of it at all, and I, who am among those who look out for such things, came upon it quite by chance. For the benefit of others, I may say that The Bad Child's Book of Beasts is published at Oxford by Messrs. Alden & Co.; that the authors, it is rumoured, are not unacquainted with Balliol; and that the volume is very slender and sheer joy from first page to last.

Although the drawings of B. T. B., to which I shall return later, are of excellence all compact, it is H. B. who must be looked upon as the predominant partner, and considered the more welcome of the two: because England has never lacked comic draughtsmen. A comic picture is the result either of intention or accident, and more often perhaps of the latter (associated with ineptitude); but good comic verse proceeds only from intention. H. B.'s nonsense is intentional and, I think, superlatively good. Like his great predecessors Lear and Carroll, he has gone to Buffon for his buffooneries; but whereas they have occasionally added to the world's fauna (with the Gryphon and the Quangle Wangle, and so on,) he has been content to keep merely to the hackneyed beasts which his young readers have already learned something about in Near Home and Far Off (those awakening, federating books, the precursors of Mr. Kipling), and has given new and valuable facts concerning them—facts for which we must always seek one comically inspired. This, for example, of the lion, is familiar when we see it, but it needed to be said:

"The Lion, the Lion, he dwells in the waste,
He has a big head and a very small waist."

So he has. Again,

"The whale that wanders round the pole
Is not a table fish."

Again, H. B. tells the rhinoceros that his hide "looks all undone," a phrase that must hereafter always be attached to that beast. It is because we have waited so long for these truths to be uttered that I think H. B. should be hailed with acclamation.

In mental equipment H. B. might be described as less imbecile than Lear and less fantastic than Lewis Carroll. A comic thought glides into his mind and glides out again on to the paper: he does not, like Lear, tax his invention, nor does he let the thought in the interim accumulate whimsical accretions as Lewis Carroll would. H. B. is a kind of nonsensical Wordsworth. Indeed, now and then the likeness is so close as to lead one to suspect intentional roguish imitation. Thus, of the camelopard:

"The Camelopard, it is said
By travellers (who never lie),
He cannot stretch out straight in bed
Because he is so high.
The clouds surround his lofty head,
His hornlets touch the sky.
How shall I hunt this quadruped?
I cannot tell! Not I!

Then follows "a picture of how people try and fail to hit that head so high," in which we see the spent bullet pausing midway 'twixt the marksman and the camelopard's contemptuous smile. The second stanza solves the difficulty: and is it not like something in the Lyrical Ballads?—

"I'll buy a little parachute
(A common parachute with wings),
I'll fill it full of arrowroot
And other necessary things,
And I will slay this fearful brute
With stones and sticks and guns and slings."

The giraffe, by the way, has always appealed to the humorist. One of Caran d'Ache's drollest fancies depicts a row of them supporting a line of telegraph wires across the desert, and Hood wrote of a giraffe recently deceased:

"They say, God wot!
He died upon the spot.
But then in spots he was so rich—
I wonder which."

In manner H. B. approaches most nearly to Lewis Carroll, who also is of Oxford. He is more severely literary than Lear. Lear, for example, could never have written so formal a stanza as this (addressed to the Bad Child):

"But so control your actions that Your friends may all repeat,
'This child is dainty as the Cat,
And as the Owl discreet.'"

Lear was more of a rollicker than H. B., although H. B. can be irresponsible enough, as when he dismisses the Dromedary with the couplet:

"The Dromedary is a cheerful bird:
I cannot say the same about the Kurd."

On the other hand, if (which is not possible) we could imagine Lewis Carroll limiting his fancy to the simplest idea concerning each creature he mentions, we might attribute many of these verses to him. Another point in common have these two writers—they are at bottom true poets. I doubt if Lear was. But from Lewis Carroll's love of children as something more than little laughing elves—a spiritual love—have come certain beautifully tender verses, as all his readers know; and here are two stanzas from H. B.'s opening address to a child:

"Your little hands were made to take
The better things and leave the worse ones:
They also may be used to shake
The Massive Paws of Elder Persons.
"And when your prayers complete the day,
Darling, your little, tiny hands
Were also made, I think, to pray
For men who lose their fairylands."

The art of B. T. B. grows on one. At the first glance his pictures may not seem very rich; but they increase and increase in fun and incident. The Yak shop; the Papa who will not buy a Yak; the Arctic explorer who warms himself with a candle; the Kurd; the historic meeting of friends on the summit of the whale; the hippopotamus who flattens leaden bullets; the flying Dodo (and who before this has ever drawn a Dodo flying?); the visitors to the Mu-se-um; the hill that is dangerous to cyclists; and the savants who have offended a frog—these are creations.

For the moment the Good Child is at a discount.

ACADEMY PORTRAITS.

VIII.—SAMUEL RICHARDSON.

Two hundred years and seven have passed since Samuel Richardson was born. He came of a father who was "a very honest man, descended from a family of middling note," and at that time a Derbyshire joiner; and a mother who was "a good woman, of a family not ungenteel." So Richardson himself described his parents. The boy was, it would seem, of the dullest when among his schoolfellows, although with the other sex he had no small measure of influence. Before he was well in his teens he was acting as muse and secretary to scores of the girls of the village. The child is father to the man, and Richardson never lost either his habit of vicarious letter-writing or his hold on womankind. Half a century later he was still surrounded by the sisterhood. On leaving school he became an industrious apprentice, married his master's daughter, as every right-minded apprentice seems to have been bound to do, and settled down very contentedly to print papers, pamphlets, and books for the rest of his life in the neighbourhood of Fleet-street.

In printing by day and receiving feminine confidences of an evening, ten, twenty, thirty years went by, until, just as the worthy Samuel Richardson was beginning his second half-century, the suggestion was made to him that he should write a series of letters which might have sound moral influence on the young persons of the age; and he sat himself down and produced Pamela; or, Virtue Rewarded. That is to say, at an age when most authors are thinking to lay aside the pen or bemoaning the poverty which disables them from doing so, Richardson was complacently and placidly beginning his career as one of the greatest novelists the world has seen. Pamela was published in 1740, and she took the town at once. She took the country too, and subsequently she numbered good intellects in Germany and France. Our own Trilby had not more sway. Everyone read Pamela, because everyone is interested in the eternal warfare of virtue and vice, especially when virtue is a girl and vice is men. The pulpit was with Richardson, and when the pulpit is with a popular author that author is made. Mr. Pope, the poet, said that Pamela would do more good than many sermons, although, as a matter of fact, the book and the sermons worked together hand in hand. At Ranelagh ladies held up the volume to display the fact that they were in the fashion; but in what degree virtue was thus encouraged and vice checked we have no record.

With the proceeds of Pamela Richardson bought retirement at Hammersmith, where he received the homage of a few great men and countless women, and where subsequently he wrote a disastrous sequel, followed by the glories of Clarissa Harlowe, and in its turn by Sir Charles Grandison. In Pamela and Clarissa Harlowe the author was at his best: he knew human nature as familiarly as a case of type, and the heart was handled as though it were a composing-stick at Salisbury-court. As a minute analyser of elemental emotion and passion, this plodding, inconspicuous printer is still the first. The accompanying portrait was painted when Richardson was sixty-one.

M. ANATOLE FRANCE AT THE FRENCH ACADEMY.

ON Christmas Eve a throng representing Paris and France witnessed the reception of M. Anatole France, who took the chair left vacant by the death, in poverty, solitude, and dishonour, of the "grand Français," Ferdinand de Lesseps. It was to hear the official praises of one who died overcome by so much blame, as well as to hear the panegyric of the new ruler of the French language, that the large audience gathered. Nor was it a difficult task that fell to the lot of M. Anatole France; the difficulty was evidently rather to restrain than to urge the natural and national rhetoric. The history of the Suez Canal is nothing less than explosive with eloquence. And when one considers what could be said, almost without the trouble of saying it, about the East and the West, the past and the present, Asia and France, one may suppose that M. France, like Clive, wondered at his own moderation. What he said was indeed said well. He was relieved, of course, of any judicial duty in regard to the later events of M. de Lesseps' life, but was free to make a reference, moving and simple, to the ruined, aged traveller sitting, in expectation of death, in his moral exile, with an old travelling rug across his knees, perfectly silent while the Panama scandals filled the world; and one day the tears were seen upon his cheeks. His widow and his many children heard his praises and what must have seemed to them a rehabilitation of his name, and received from the Academy and the audience a public, though silent, sign of homage and respect. M. Anatole France, in the uniform, had for his two "god-fathers" M. François Coppée and M. Ludovic Halévy.

His own welcome was spoken by the Vice-Rector of the Academy, M. Gréard. But for the peroration, which was devoted also to Ferdinand de Lesseps, this speech was, needless to say, distinctively literary. It was, according to custom, an appreciation, addressed, in the second person, to M. Anatole France, of M. Anatole France's writings, mingled with biography. M. Gréard, having sketched the new Academician's childhood, without too much emphasis, passed on to the search for the chief characteristic of the literature in which he had soon found his vocation.

"Much is said to-day," he averred, "of an interior life; but no one has carried further than you [M. Anatole France] the practice thereof and the love. You prize, amongst all others, chiefly those silent souls, deepest mines in which the diamond shapes itself in the dark. If you are seldom seen at the theatre, it is that the action of the players disturbs and oppresses you. Rather than the passive pleasure of seeing a play would you have the active joy of reading a book. To your mind the finest spectacle is that which you can give to yourself, as you read alone in your armchair. You close the book, and your spirit takes its way upon its own errand, and is its own subject; you follow where your own thought leads, and may bid us, too, follow. You hold that the good critic is he who tells the adventures of his soul amid masterpieces. Nor in this do you believe that you differ from the rest of men. Those who write are intent only upon themselves; we in turn, who read, are thinking of ourselves. And this is the right disposition for those who are to understand and to entertain one another."

The most significant passage of M. Gréard's speech is, as might be expected, a study of tendencies. He said:

"The art of the seventeenth century believed in virtue; the art of the eighteenth believed in reason; our own century for a time believed in passion. But it would seem that in this present day there is no faith but in one thing—instinct, the base and brutal instinct of which naturalism has declared itself the apostle. . . . Caught at its real origin, at the moment of its primal inspiration, naturalism is found to have been the legitimate reaction of the spirit of observation, justified by reason and knowledge, against the abuses of sentiment. And, indeed, how shall we ignore the riches of those elements with which this fruitful alluvial action endowed the exhausted soil of our literature? Are you not, even you too, a realist? Your descriptions, your analyses, all your marvellous pictures of the physical world and of the moral, do they not proceed from the principles of that very school, if by naturalism we are to understand, as Balzac and Flaubert, Sainte-Beuve and Taine understood, a direct intuition, a frank expression of the things of life? That which offends you is the systematic exaggeration of these principles which has followed the first impulse of happy innovation; what offends you is the error encouraged by a far too easy success, which has produced triviality of observation, impoverishment of ideas, and the triumph of workmanship or process. Your Attic moderation has never been able to reconcile itself with this encumbered style of writing, in which every phrase is somewhat like a storehouse for household furniture; neither this have you suffered, nor the vaporous phrasing of the Symbolists, across which attentive eyes perceive a something, as in the lantern of the fabulist, but fail to distinguish what. Who will prescribe a remedy for these temporary maladies of the wits of France? To-day, from every point of the compass, men are summoning the ideal; these climb towers, and those cry, 'Sister Anne, do you see nothing coming?' It is now many years since you, the first, gave vent to a cry of distress, and to a call for the reaction of good sense and good taste. 'It is asserted,' you wrote, 'that the naturalistic novel is part of a literature founded upon science. But, in truth, it is denied by science, which knows only truth, and by art, which knows only beauty. The naturalistic novel drags in vain from one to the other its flat deformity. The one and the other reject it. It is of no use, and it is ugly. . . . Would art be worth what it costs us if it had not the use of sowing our lives with charming images?'

"Your novels, Monsieur, your stories," continued M. Gréard, "are full of those images of delight; and I am sure it is by no means this part of your work that seems to you least happy. A friend once asked you what form of literary invention was most to be recommended to those fain to wield the pen. 'That of a story,' you replied, 'a story no longer than your finger.' The very nature of the story is to be rapid and brief; it suits thereby a society like our own, which is busy and counts its hours. In a few phrases it encloses much reason, and bestows more thoughts than it puts into words. It is a dish for the epicure, and a dainty for men of wit. You have an infinite admiration for Balzac in his power; he is in your eyes the greatest historian of modern society. But why did he not practise further the graceful and lucid story—the story of French literature—which can be read in a breath and flies across centuries, such as Daphnis and Chloe, the Princesse de Clèves, Paul et Virginie, or Manon Lescaut? As for yourself, you have done better than to draw up the laws of this literature, you have also bestowed upon us its models. The pleasantly deceptive titles of your books promise us a single story; we open them, and a flock flies forth."

After a more detailed praise of several of M. Anatole France's stories than many English readers would have knowledge enough to appreciate, the speaker quoted his author and hearer to the following effect:

"'Since,' you have said, 'I first addressed a fit and chosen public upon intellectual things, I have—to do myself justice—been often uncertain, but not once insincere. I have been true, and by that fact I have earned the right to speak to mankind. Assuredly it is no merit of mine. In order to lie with ability, a rhetoric is needed of which I do not know a single word. I am not able to speak except for the expression of my thought.' Nor," added M. Gréard, "have you ever permitted a reader to fail in understanding the very utmost of your thought."

The Vice-Rector of the Academy would give its new member his proper place and epoch, he told him, not in the last century, nor at the Renaissance, but in Egypt, at Alexandria, the city of the latest philosophers and of the first great Christian monks, of subtleties and of ecstasies.

"But, Monsieur, you are nevertheless a Frenchman and a Parisian through all the fibres and roots of your talent and your heart. You love the soil of France, mother of a race courageous and delicate, you love its light language, rapid and gay, which rises from the spirit of the people as the lark from the furrow; you love the ancient legends, whether warlike or bright, upon which were spent the earliest efforts of our genius; you love the great traditions of classic culture which France has received from antiquity and which have fixed her destiny. That patriotism is, for you, sacred above all things."

M. Gréard consoled with M. Anatole France in that he had lost the co-operation of Gounod in a long-hoped for "musical chronicle" of the life and death of Joan of Arc, and then closed his subject with feeling:

"Artisans, labourers, friars, theologians, knights, soldiers, people, sovereigns, all who have given their intellect, their sweat, their blood in France—these are your fathers, and you bless them. . . . Ah, the noble impulse! And how far it takes us from unhealthy dreams and dissolving dilettantisms! How good it is to breathe these grand breaths, and to feel our hearts open and upraised!"

PARIS LETTER.

(From our French Correspondent.)

IN to-day's Journal there is an entertaining correspondence on Christmas, signed by most of the popular literary names of Paris. The editor has invited various personages to write their opinion on the English and German fashion of feasting Christmas. André Theuriot, the new Academician, writes:

"Since we imitate the English, we should have borrowed from them, from the social point of view, that most agreeable custom of the mistletoe, which permits gentlemen [English in the original] during the Christmas rejoicings to kiss all the pretty women they meet under a branch of mistletoe suspended from the ceiling. This custom would be extremely acceptable to the young men, still more so to the old."

Hector Malot writes:

"Not French, Christmas. English, yes, with mountains of fat turkeys. German, yes, with tons of sausages and sauerkraut, the tree and the log. But where do you find the joy of Christmas in France? In romances, perhaps. And even there! Germany and England have a whole Christmas literature: some of the stories really admirable. Where is ours? Our New Year's Day suffices us, and it is too near to Christmas Day for the one not to spoil the other. Try and find out how much is spent on feasting in Paris at Christmas, and compare it with the sum expended on flowers at the Assumption, and you will see how much above the Child we here place the Mother."

Marcel Prévost airily adds:

"Christmas from the social point of view? An occasion, never numerous enough, to imagine oneself English—thanks to Christmas cards and mistletoe."

While Jean Aicard, the Provençal novelist and poet, drops into flowery prose:

"What do I think of Christmas, I, lost child of Provence? Ah, my friend, I regard it as the feast of feasts, because it is the feast of love. Down there we gather round the hearth. Firelight sings the song of the sun vanished or pale beneath the clouds of winter. Verdure breaking freshly out upon the furrowed earth; the sacred grass blades that give us bread, in the midst of death announce the immortality of life, and across the valleys and hill-sides the absent ones set out for home greetings. Walks beneath the stars begin. Bereft households are brightened by homecomings. All things at this time are in league with the heart against the obscure forces of saddening winter, in the favour and honour of tenderness and gratitude. . . . What is the réveillon of the town, at its worst even, but the conquering and tenacious remembrance of the need of hope, of true love? And many a poor creature, in her street bravery, feasting in the private room of a fashionable restaurant, on Christmas night, pauses a while to dream of the humble hot soup of the réveillon of her village."

Léon de Tinseau maintains that

"Christmas is not, will never be here, an event, a crisis, an upheaval of all the strata of family, social, and national life, as it is in England and in America. It is not here, as in those lands of tradition and of sentiment, an arrest of the public machine, industrial, financial, intellectual; factories closed, the ocean crossed for an embrace of 'the old folk,' a mysterious fermentation exciting the heart, awaking memories, bringing tears to the eyes of the solitary, because she is no more, or because life has been against him, or he himself has gone to the dogs." . . . "The French Christmas" he adds, "is only a recent copy of the English feast."

The most personal, the oddest, and certainly the most interesting of this curious correspondence is Lecocq's quaint letter. The composer of Madame Angot tells us naively how an old aunt, who had been a pupil of Monsieur Boieldieu, left behind her a piano which Lecocq purchased for the sum of 7fr. 50c., and which often served the popular composer at night on account of "the discretion of its sonorousness." In remembrance of this pious aunt, whom he greatly loved, his first composition on this old instrument was a Christmas hymn, to the words of Théophile Gautier:

"Le Ciel est noir, La terre est blanche."

The Empress Eugénie accepted the dedication, and offered the struggling musician the choice of a jewel or 300fr.

"To my shame, I admit, after a moment's hesitation, I chose the 300fr., which at that moment were heaven sent and represented Pachtolus. . . . Whenever Christmas returns I am haunted with this memory. I love the old piano, with its yellowed notes, its shrill and veiled tones, like those of a great grandmother, and I play for myself my little Christmas carol, thinking that my good aunt above is listening to me—perhaps."

M. Jules Lemaitre, who has officially dis severed himself from current journalism in disconnecting himself from the Debats, sometimes contributes a brilliant article, in freelance style, to the Figaro. This week he has written a subtle and profound page in his customary tone of persiflage, on the charity of the wealthy.

"The wealthy are privileged in more ways than are at once apparent. While charity, in its most elementary form—the gift of money—is the easiest to those who have much of it, these same—in virtue of their wealth, which procures them attention and permits them an imposing generosity—are singularly more assured of a public gratitude than persons of modest means, and thus receive here below the reward of their goodwill. So that charity might be recommended to millionaires as an advantageous 'sport,' when duty failed to inspire it. . . . A woman of the people not only gives the little money she earns by the sweat of her brow, but her time, her strength her heart; in brief, 'sacrifices' herself to forsaken children, to houseless girls, to the sick and the aged. She may be mentioned at the Academy. The Academy cannot bestow the Legion of Honour upon her: it gives her five hundred francs, to which it adds, it is true, sometimes a silly word or an ironical compliment."

NOTES AND NEWS.

TO Mr. Watts, R.A., more than to any other living painter, will posterity owe an adequate idea of the personal appearance of the great authors of this generation. His various portraits of Tennyson are satisfactory, not merely as paintings, but also as likenesses, allowing just a little for the glamour it is permitted to add to the portrait of a man of genius. The portrait of Mr. Matthew Arnold is open to the same observation; and Mr. Robert Browning, though perhaps a little shrewder in expression than his portraits show him to be, is adequately presented by Mr. Watts to future generations of admirers. The portrait of Mr. George Meredith, now on view at the New Gallery, is a very good likeness; but, differing from other portraits already named, it must be labelled for posterity as a rendering somewhat less noble than the reality. The portrait of Mr. Swinburne is not recognisable as the poet of to-day; but it is a good presentment of him at the age of about thirty—the exact date at which it was painted is mysteriously omitted from the catalogue in Regent-street.

EXCELLENT is the William Morris portrait at the New Gallery; and excellent, too, the portrait, in the National Portrait Gallery, of Sir Henry Taylor, one of the first of this painter's poet-sitters. "I want to make you a modern Jove," said Mr. Watts. To whom Sir Henry replied, "But I prefer to be a jovial modern." There is one regret mixed with our gratitude to Mr. Watts—that never did he, too, try his brush with Robert Louis Stevenson, most elusive of sitters. Nor are we content that Mr. Ruskin, who has done more for art than any man of his generation, should have been less often a sitter than almost any man of note among his contemporaries. Nevertheless, when you remember how amateur and unsatisfying are most of the painted records of Wordsworth, Coleridge, Shelley, and Keats, you are bound to think that the literary men of a later generation have been remarkably lucky in their limners.

MISS PHYLLIS GOTCH, the "Doris" of Mr. H. D. Lowry's Make Believe, is, as all the world knows, the daughter of parents who are both painters. Let the record be made in black and white; for, naturally enough, the young heroine is beginning to be spoken of already among inhabitants of Newlyn as "That lass of Lowry's."

PROF. MAX MÜLLER continues his "Literary Recollections" in the January Cosmopolis, and tells the story of the burning of Froude's Nemesis of Faith. It is something to have this story from Prof. Müller's accurate memory. It appears that a tutor of Exeter College, Dr. Sewell, referred to the book at the end of a lecture, and, after warning his pupils against it, he asked whether any of them had read it. "One of the undergraduates produced a copy which belonged to him. Dr. Sewell continued his sermonette, and, warming with his subject, he finished by throwing the book, which did not belong to him, into the fire, at the same time stirring the coals to make them burn. Of what followed there are two versions. Dr. Sewell, when he had finished, asked his class, 'Now, what have I done?' 'You have burned my copy,' the owner of the book said in a sad voice, 'and I shall have to buy a new one.' The other version of the reply was, 'You have stirred the fire, sir.'"

WHAT followed is well known. Froude lost his fellowship, and when he accepted the headmastership of a Tasmanian college his persecutors ousted him from that refuge. And then we have this moving story of Froude's poverty: "Froude had to sell his books one by one, and was trying hard to support himself by his pen. This was then not so easy a matter as it is now. At that very time, however, I received a cheque for £200 from an unknown hand, with a request that I would hand it to Froude, to show him that he had friends and sympathisers who would not forsake him. It was not till many years later that I discovered the donor, and Froude was then able to return him the money, which at the time had saved him from drowning. I should like to mention the name, but that kind friend in need is no longer among the living, and I have a feeling that even now he would wish his name to remain unknown."

ARPROPOS of the extension of the laboratories and library of the Royal Institution, Mr. John Leighton, F.S.A., has decided to present his Faraday Papers to be placed with those bequeathed by the great philosopher. The Papers mainly consist of letters from Faraday to Edward Magrath at a period when letter writing was an art. It is little known that Faraday for a short time was the secretary of the Athenæum Club, and that Magrath was his intime and coeval in age. Mr. Leighton is one of the doyens of the Royal Institution, and was proposed by Faraday in 1855. The new library in Albemarle-street forms part of the Davy-Faraday Building.

THE new laboratory to which the above paragraph refers was opened, it will be remembered, by the Prince of Wales on December 22, and is the gift of Dr. Ludwig Mond, F.R.S. The new building adjoins the Royal Institution, and was formerly Lord Cowley's town house. As now transformed it contains nine private rooms for research, besides other compartments for organic, inorganic, pyrotechnical, and thermo-technical investigations. There are also offices, a balance room, and a mechanic's workshop. The superintendent of the new laboratory will be Dr. Alexander Scott, and Lord Rayleigh and Prof. Dewar will be the directors.

IN the preface to the American edition of A Window in Thrums Mr. J. M. Barrie writes: "I think there are soft-hearted readers here and there who will be glad to know that there never was any Jess. . . . It wrote itself very quickly. I have read that I re-wrote it eight times, but it was written once only, nearly every chapter, I think, at a sitting." Readers of Margaret Ogilvy have been let into the secret of the origin of Jess.

MR. BARRIE'S brief preface to The Little Minister contains this passage: "No one could persuade me to add half an inch to the stature of the little minister. . . . You know when the short man is introduced that he is to be a mere foil to a six-footer, that he must love in vain, that at the most the lady will offer to be a sister to him." And Sentimental Tommy follows the admission: "This is not in the smallest degree the book I meant it to be. Tommy ran away with the author."

THE interpretation of sacred pictures is usually done in a style which the judicious cannot applaud, yet cannot openly criticise. But when an explanation is offered which is "both contrary to the spirit of the picture and to the intentions of the artist," a word of protest, embodied in a letter to the Times, may be the needful thing. Such a protest has been raised this week against the description of Dagnan-Bouveret's picture, "The Lord's Supper," which is handed to persons now viewing this work at the Goupil Gallery. It appears that the figure on the left of Christ is described as Peter; but the writer to the Times, Mr. J. C. Warburg, asserts that he has the authority of the artist for stating that the figure on the left of Our Lord is Judas, and that the misrepresentation has been made "contrary to the express wishes of the painter." If, as Mr. Warburg thinks, the meaning of the picture has been tampered with to suit the prejudices of the British public, it was right to say so.

A NUMBER of water-colour and pencil drawings from the hand of Charlotte Brontë have been added to the museum of the Brontë Society at Haworth, accompanied by evidence of their authenticity. A vein of artistic skill ran through the family, and it was at one time hoped that Branwell might undergo a course of study at the Royal Academy. As it was, he did study portrait-painting at Bradford.

THE young American-Japanese poet, Yone Noguchi, whom our New York correspondent introduced to the readers of the ACADEMY last week, is the subject of an article, with a portrait, in our Transatlantic contemporary, the Literary Digest. Noguchi, who is only twenty-one, has a sweet and thoughtful face, but he writes like this:

"The flat-boarded earth, laid down at night, rustling under the darkness. The Universe grows smaller, palpitating against its destiny.

"My chilly soul—centre of the world—gives seat to audible tears—the songs of the cricket.

"I drink the darkness of a corner of the Universe—alas! Square immovable world to me, on my bed! Suggesting what—god or demon—far down, under my body?

"I am as a lost wing among the countless atoms of high Heaven!

"Would the invisible Night shake off her radiant light, answering the knocking of my soft-formed voice!"

FROM time to time we are in receipt of letters, not quite fitted for our correspondence columns, asking for information on this matter and that concerning literature. This week, for example, a gentleman inquires for a list of historians (specifying the period each one covers, and the publisher's name) which would be of the best assistance for imparting a thorough knowledge not only of English history from the earliest times to our own day, but also sound literary style. Now this is the kind of question to which many answers can be given, and we invite replies from our readers. To these questions and replies we are ready to devote space week by week, and we hope the feature will be found an interesting one.

IN Punch this week a drawing by Mr. F. H. Townsend is to be found. Whether or not it is the first appearance of this clever artist in the pages of our contemporary we cannot say, but we are glad to see his talent thus recognised. The illustrations to Peacock's novels in Messrs. Macmillan's new edition, marked, it seems to us, the turning point in Mr. Townsend's career. His drawing in Punch, which represents three children reading old English classical novels in an expurgated form, is peculiarly interesting to us, because a copy of the Bowdlerised Tom Jones which serves as Mr. Townsend's peg has been lying on our shelves for weeks, while we have been wondering what to say about it. Punch supplies the answer. Everything nowadays is done for children; even the classics climb down to them. Whether the children are therefore to be envied is another matter—probably not, for as a humorist has said, "They will so soon be 'us.'"

THE prosperous company which owns and controls The Illustrated London News and other periodicals has just acquired Pick-Me-Up.

UNDER the satisfactorily simple and self-explanatory name of Girls a new weekly paper will shortly be issued from the office of Pearson's Weekly.

MR. FRANCIS DARWIN announces that he is preparing a supplementary series of the letters of his father, the late Charles Darwin, which will comprise a selection from those letters of purely scientific interest which he was unable to print in the Life, together with whatever fresh material may come to hand. Mr. Darwin (whose address is Wychfield, Cambridge) therefore asks that those of his father's correspondents who have not already done so will allow him to make copies of letters in their possession, and he reminds them that the merest notes are often of value.

WE regret to learn that Mr. George Moore has been the victim of a gun accident. It was feared at first that Mr. Moore had received an injury to one of his eyes, but this has happily proved not to be the case—a circumstance which is the more fortunate because Mr. Moore is engrossed in his new novel, and had only gone into the country for a short period of relaxation.

MR. G. W. STEEVENS has completed the revision of his Presidential Election letters to the Daily Mail, on which he has been busy since his return from America. The MS. is now in the hands of the publishers, Messrs. William Blackwood & Sons, who will issue the letters in a volume, The Land of the Dollar, early in January.

IN referring last week to the beautiful edition of Marcus Aurelius, published by Mr. A. L. Humphreys, we omitted to state that Mr. Long's translation is the one adopted.

UNDER the title of A Pearl of the Realm Messrs. Hutchinson & Co. will publish very shortly a romance of the time of King Charles the First. The scene of the story is largely laid at the Nonsuch Palace, which stood near Ewell, in Surrey.

BISHOP PEARSON, during the later years of his life, compiled a commonplace book of remarkable passages and striking thoughts which he met with in the course of reading. His widow has placed these in the hands of Mr. Elliot Stock, who will publish them very shortly in a volume, with a preface by the Bishop of Manchester.

UNDER the title of "Occasional Papers," the late Dean Church's contributions to the Times, the Saturday Review, and the Guardian between the years of 1846 and 1890 will shortly be included in the Eversley Series (Macmillan).

MR. RALPH RICHARDSON is preparing a supplement to his work George Morland, Painter, 1763-1804, entitled George Morland's Pictures; their Present Possessors, with details of the collections. It will be published very shortly by Mr. Elliot Stock.

THE next volume to appear in Mr. T. Fisher Unwin's "Children's Study" series will be a History of France, written by Mary C. Rowsell, whose historical stories, such as Thorndyke Manor and The Story of a Queen, have shown her skill in blending history and fiction.

ART.

MR. G. F. WATTS AT THE NEW GALLERY.

NEEDLESS to say, a collection of 155 paintings chosen by himself does a painter comprehensive justice, and the work of Mr. Watts is shown this winter not only in various kinds of accomplishment, but partly in process. Moreover, he takes the opportunity to explain his thought in a rather strangely punctuated introduction, which it might be ungracious to say is unnecessary; but there is no need to do more for Mr. Watts's allegories than to give them titles. Not a few do not even owe this debt to literature. Granted the conventions of a very simple and ancient symbolism, these works announce themselves. They hold, as strictly as is possible to imaginative art, within the limits of their own method of expression as paintings. They lie within the field of vision—that is, of possible vision, of imaginative vision, and of the vision of earlier or Oriental people, immemorially used to think in visible forms rather than in words.

It is not legitimate to paint a metaphor, a figure of speech, or anything in which the mental picture is not intended to be definite. "That fox, Herod," is not a phrase to be mentally illustrated by an image of a fox, and is therefore not paintable. But every parable is paintable, and so is anything that might be proposed to the spirit of a prophet in a dream. So much it is well to say, in order to prevent the popular present tendency to limit and hamper the arts by way of unintelligent reaction against their unbounded confusion in the near past. Mr. Watts's allegories are pictorial mental visions, and fit to be proposed to the bodily eyes of those who have not been visited by the vision of the mind.

THE public should be especially interested in those works which are to be presented to the nation by their generous author; and among these is that magnificent composition, "Love and Death." Even rarer than the tenderness and power of this great group are the directness of the movement and the sense of weight in the march of Death. There is one overmastering force in the grasp whereof we all live and die—our mortal eyes have never seen anything that was not immediately subject to it; and this is the force that many and many a praised painter impotently defies, setting especially the human figure free from it with a futile freedom—the force of gravitation. There is nothing less common in the art of painting than the ruling, ordering, and controlling fact of weight.

THE "Court of Death," almost equally well known, is also to be national property. It is one of the greatest, as it is the largest, of the works of a great painter; and even if it should never pass out of its unfinished state it will be a national possession to do us honour. The repose of the central or culminating group—seated, lying, and standing: Death on her throne, the newly born dead in her lap, and the erect angels—is more than Egyptian, and the slow actions of the human creatures offering their homage are as deliberate and controlled as they are real. It seems perhaps not altogether a grave device—rather a mechanical invention for the increase of mystery—to efface the eyes. Mr. Watts has very frequent recourse to it, risking an unfortunate effect of blankness where he had intended unfathomableness. But an important consequence, no doubt within his intention, is that expression—blotted out where ninety-nine out of every hundred people will look for it (in the eyes), is entrusted and committed to the whole figure. Mr. Watts has several admirable instances of bodily expression—no common quality in our present manner of observing the nude, and a very noble one.

THE "Spirit of Christianity" is also upon this list of gifts. It is full of dignity and colour; would that the nude infants gathered within the red robe had not been drawn with limbs so little infantine and yet so fat. Surely the greatest lover of long limbs should be able to reconcile himself to the natural fact that the limbs of babies are very short; the attempt to give them a false elegance is indocile, and brings no luck. "Time, Death, and Judgment," with figures moving in the wind of their great approach, the exquisite "Love and Life," "Sic Transit," "Mammon," "The Minotaur," "Chaos," "Jonah," "Great Possessions," "The Messenger," "Peace and Goodwill," "Faith," and "The Dweller in the Innermost" are also destined to be national property, and of each will the nation be proud. So are "Death Crowning Innocence," especially valuable for the fine flesh-painting in the little pearl-like body of the child, and the immortal "Hope." In this lovely figure, which has the eyes hidden—not by a sleight-of-hand with the paint-brush, but frankly with a bandage—there is something indeed exquisite in the implication of their half-smile by the half-smile of the mouth. The attitude of the figure is divinely expressive.

Of the three great Eve pictures, the finest—because "She shall be Called Woman," ought to be finally marred for all reasonable eyes by its proportions—is the "Eve Tempted," full of charm of action. The gaiety of the body, the freshness with which the face is dipped into the leaves (the eyes, again, hidden), and the sweetness of the colour make this splendid canvas one of the painter's finest flesh-paintings. Why, by the way, was Mr. Watts advised to add catalogue descriptions to these sufficient Eves, and to write the condemned phrase, "her wealth of golden hair"? It is perhaps not necessary for a painter to know that authors do not now write "wealth of golden hair," but the words should have been edited. With pleasure do we welcome the opportunity of seeing again such a classic work as "The Childhood of Jupiter," with a head of a child as great as any in the schools of painting; such an example of expressive grace as the masculine figure of the "Genius of Greek Poetry"; and work so brilliant as Mr. Watts has given to "Mischief," and the yet more splendid "Fata Morgana." Another joy is "Good Luck to Your Fishing," the jewel-like child and jewel-like sea of which are one of Mr. Watts's successes, not only of colour, but of surface. It is in surface that his work sometimes fails.

THE beautiful "Paolo and Francesca" remains, among so many, the painter's most keen expression of emotion. As for the "Orpheus and Eurydice," the action is but a dance—Orpheus on one foot catching an Eurydice whose knees have given way, and who has returned to the weight of death. The several visions of the horses of the Apocalypse are all exceedingly noble, the large picture of "The Rider on the White Horse" being not only most imaginative, but singularly full of energy and movement.

As for the landscapes, which are not many, Mr. Watts is assuredly at his best in those delicate mysteries "The Island of Corsica" and "A Sea Ghost." The lovely mist seems here to hide more than it reveals, and persuades you that if you could see better you would see more. When Mr. Watts has the clear mountains of Carrara to paint he gives to those fine marbles a somewhat dull emphasis. Moreover, his "Bay of Naples" is curiously un-Italian. As for the strange attempts to paint more of a cloud than the laws of vision would enable any eye to see, in "Rain Passing Away," it is surely—in spite of all beauty of colour and illumination—an error; certain laws of construction and of perspective seem to be set at naught for the love of an exaggeration.

THE portraits are almost as well known as the allegories. They are exceedingly unequal, ranging from something in no degree short of a masterpiece to insecure paintings of something little more vital and solid than a mask. To the prettiness of the "Mr. Walter Crane" is obviously due much of the welcome this well-painted portrait is always sure of. The "Mr. George Meredith" is, as it were, mechanically a fine and perfect likeness, but none the less a failure in character. The "Mrs. Percy Wyndham" is throughout a pure triumph.

FINALLY, the chief part of this great work of a modern artist is denied the purest praise because, strong as it is, it has the fault that should be left to the weak—exaggeration. We know not how far Mr. Watts's wishes may go in respect to the figure; he manifestly thinks it should have been measured nine or ten heads in height, but why stop there? The Greeks stopped at nature. They have left literally no single example of what Mr. Watts permits himself as the model of a tall figure. And it is nothing less than distressing to find their counsels, of which moderation was the very life and force, immoderately improved upon. At best this is but a cheap device for gaining elegance, at the worst it becomes insolent and grotesque. So, too, with the fine and strong characteristic of a broad neck and a small head together. This, too, is Greek, but Mr. Watts uses it with a most un-Greek lack of control.

DRAMA.

THIS week I ought to be retrospective about the achievements of the English stage in 1896. I must ask my readers to excuse me. It is my misfortune and not the fault of the stage that I cannot remember having seen any large number of plays which have made an epoch, or even marked appreciably any progress or decline. But since that is the case, it seems unwise to bore myself, and probably to lose any readers I may have, by enlarging on what has been sufficiently discussed already. It would also be a task of considerable difficulty, for if I may be so vulgar as to write of my personal concerns, I may say that I keep neither programmes nor anything I write about their contents. I am off with the old love before I am on with the new. It always gives me pleasure to be in a theatre, and therefore I am pleased to earn a certain quantity of bread by recording my opinions for the benefit of anybody who cares to be guided by an average taste and intelligence in his theatre-going. But I make no claim to be a comprehensive or scientific student of the subject, and, in fine, my memory of the plays of 1896 is entirely defective. I have an idea that the sum of their features is that what one stupidly called "problem plays"—every play is a problem play—have gone out, and what one absurdly called "musical comedies"—they are never comedies, and seldom musical—have come in very much; that Mr. Pinero, the incorrigible, has not written a farce; that "Little Eyclf" has been produced, and that "Richard III." has been discovered to be a comic play. The well-established actors have continued their reputations, and Miss Julia Neilson has made a clever Rosalind. Of the "arrivals," I should place first that of Miss Elsie Jeffreys as a comedy actress in "His Little Dodge," and next, Mr. John Le Hay's little Jew. But these are but the recollections of a moment.

AND now to the new productions, of which there have been more than usual since last I wrote in the ACADEMY. The largest is, of course, the pantomime at Drury Lane. It is an excellent pantomime as pantomimes go, but I wonder—and hope I may wonder with safety to myself—how many of the writers who write themselves into raptures over it really enjoyed it all the way through. There were very pretty spectacles in it, very pretty ballets; but for my part I confess I was weary of them after the first two hours—the thing lasted five. Why should these things last so long? They involve as much trouble and discomfort as a political meeting. This one, in particular, annoyed one by a piece of defective stage-management, which introduced two people (for the first time) to sing an inferior music-hall song after twelve o'clock. I was almost glad it was hissed. However, I have every wish to do justice to the skill displayed, and profess that some of the scenes—"The Garden of the Palace" for example, and "Aladdin's Palace"—were very beautiful, and that the ballet danced in "The Interior of the Cave" was delightful, especially in the convolutions of Madame Grigolati and her "aerial troupe."

BUT why should the dialogue of the pantomime be so dull? This was not an especial sinner, if at least it was an example. I should be the last person to complain of "vulgarity" if the vulgarity were amusing, but who can be amused by the halting twaddle one is condemned to hear at the pantomime? One does not hear all of it, certainly; the female performers are generally inaudible, but in such a case one may judge the whole by the part. In "Aladdin" there was a long scene between a washerwoman and an emperor, the point of which was that the washerwoman would not deliver "the wash" until the emperor had paid for it. Mr. Dan Leno, as the washerwoman, made some fairly good low comedy out of it, but the scene was intolerably drawn out. One does not look for incisive wit or subtle humour in the dialogue of a pantomime, but it might be merry and free from absolute inanition. Both Mr. Dan Leno and Mr. Herbert Campbell are funny comedians, and are certain to make one laugh now and then, but we have seen both to better advantage. Of the other performers it is necessary to say only that Miss Ada Blanche played very cleverly and vivaciously as Aladdin; that Miss Decima Moore, in the somewhat passive part of the princess, did a pretty love-scene and sang prettily a pretty love-song with Aladdin; that Miss Somerset did a graceful dance and Mr. Cinquevalli some excellent tricks of juggling. I do not think that Mr. Oscar Barrett can make this pantomime as artistic as his productions at the Lyceum—perhaps the size and traditions of Drury Lane forbid—but with some cutting of the dialogue, greater rapidity in the action, and a little more fun from his comedians, it should be made a success.

I FEAR I cannot prophesy success for "The Pilgrim's Progress" at the Olympic. It will probably fall between two stools. The "religious" public will be warned off by its ballets and spectacular effects, and the public which is attracted by such things will not care about its solemnity. A sort of pantomime, they will say, or a burlesque with the fun left out. I am sorry, and should be glad to be proved wrong, for it was evident that a great deal of pains had been spent upon it, and in view of the many ill-rehearsed and carelessly slung together plays I see I take such pains as a mark of proper respect. Moreover, they are by no means unintelligent pains. The designers of the scenes had artistic tact and sense of colour: "Castle Joyous" was a beautiful scene, and so was "Vanity Fair." The crowds were carefully arranged and well-drilled. Some of Herr Meyer Lutz' music was extremely pretty. There was a very fairly good ballet in the "Vanity Fair" scene.

BUT there were strongly prevailing causes for ill-success. The first was the absence of humour in the whole production. I do not mean that jokes should have been made: I mean that a sense of humour in the producers might have saved the taking of a proverbial step. For the fight between Apollyon and Christian was ridiculous, and so were the invisibly-wired angels. The angel Raphael was ridiculous. Another cause was the character of the blank verse: it was by no means fatuous or silly, but it was pompous, a little empty, and monotonous. A third cause was the difficulty of following the play in the early scenes—a fault partly of the avoidance of names in the dialogue and partly of inaudible players. A fourth (which, perhaps, should not have been one) was the violence done to poor John Bunyan: his humble Christian became a glorified, gilded youth, addressed by his friends as “dear boy”—seriously, of course. But with all these disadvantages it could not be said that the piece was ineffective: certainly, amateurs of scenic effects should see it. The acting was not good, on the whole. Mr. Abingdon worked hard in the feebly written part of Apollyon, and was dignified, more or less, and sardonic. Mr. Celli sang a solo with pleasant gusto. Mr. Thorpe was a rather mincing Raphael. Miss Grace Hawthorne's Christian was feeble and mostly inaudible. Miss Esmé Beringer, who played Speranza, Christian's love, and ended up as a quite angelic angel, was far more impressive, and should have been cast as Christian. Miss Mary Milton was a merry and jolly “Madame Babble,” and helped the first act considerably. The best acting, perhaps, in the piece was Miss Laura Johnson's “Malignity”—a wicked and weird old hag, played with some realism and much force. If the first act were deprived of some of its more or less irrelevant speeches, and the whole thing played more distinctly and vivaciously, there might be hope for “The Pilgrim's Progress.” Though, artistically, it had never a chance of fulfilling its large ambition, it bored me less than most “musical comedies.”

THERE is a pleasant Christmassy sort of entertainment on Monday to Thursday afternoons at Terry's. The first piece is Mrs. Oscar Beringer's adaptation of Dickens's “Holly Tree Inn.” The dialogue is not always natural, and the fun is just the least bit cheap; but the full-flavoured Dickensian sentiment is not amiss, and is prettily expressed. The two children are played by Miss Valli Valli and Master Stewart Dawson, both very clever children—Miss Valli the better in acting, Master Dawson the sounder elocutionist. “Love in Idleness” follows, a somewhat feebly conceived play, but—it also—of a kindly sentiment compact. Mr. Terry is at his best in it, and the rest of the company work well, especially Mr. de Lange, our best comic Frenchman.

I AM sure that “Black-Ey'd Susan” will run for some time, and must defer my remarks on it. One needs space for such a theme.

MUSIC OF THE YEAR.

THERE are certain times when it is reasonable to look back and see what has been done for musical art; for this the close of a year is specially suitable. The record of the last twelve months may not be exciting, yet, on the whole, I deem it a favourable one. The increase in the number of orchestral concerts is especially gratifying; among instrumental works those for orchestra claim highest rank. During the past year, in addition to the usual Palace, Richter, Henschel, Mottl, and Philharmonic Concerts, MM. Lamoureux and Colonne came over from Paris with their respective orchestras, and gave special series. M. Lamoureux paid us two visits—in the spring, and again in the autumn; M. Colonne came only once. Both are able conductors and have excellent orchestras; popular opinion, however—and, I think, not unjustly—awarded the palm to M. Lamoureux. The performances under the direction of the latter were most finished, and the ensemble of the players was altogether remarkable. The rendering of Beethoven's “Eroica” during the second series was one of his highest achievements. In the selection of works, although not altogether free from reproach, M. Lamoureux surpassed his rival. Among interesting novelties which he introduced, a Symphony of César Franck's attracted special notice. That composer's music, little known here, deserves the attention of musicians.

THE poor attendances of late at the Crystal Palace caused a well-founded rumour to be spread that they would probably have to be discontinued. A pamphlet published calling attention to the long and valuable services of Mr. A. Manns, and appealing to subscribers for continued support, seems to have had good result: the spring series is already announced. The programmes last year, as regards novelties, were not particularly striking. Strauss' “Till Eulenspiegel,” a clever humoresque, a symphony by the Scandinavian composer, Sinding, and another one by Mr. Barclay Jones, count among the most important; the last named was indeed only a novelty at these concerts.

THE Orchestral Concerts at the Queen's Hall, under the direction of Mr. H. J. Wood, are gaining in merit and popularity. Practice, it is said, makes perfect, and Mr. Wood enjoys opportunities of practising the art of conducting such as are rarely available. Mr. Newman, to whose enterprise the scheme is due, selected a good man—for Mr. Wood has natural gifts—and one who is, moreover, improving every day. The programmes, too, show eclectic taste. Care is necessary, however, in the selection of novelties; two of Dvorák's symphonic Poems were recently introduced, apparently merely to anticipate Richter, not on account of merit. Novelties do not spell empty seats as in earlier days. The public takes greater and more intelligent interest in them, but they should not be lightly chosen; the Poems alluded to above were not worthy of the great name which they bore. The Oratorio Concerts at the Queen's Hall, under the direction of Mr. Randegger, also deserve favourable notice. The Albert Hall concerts under Dr. Bridge, the new and energetic successor of Sir J. Barnby, may continue to flourish, but there is ample room for the two societies. Mr. Randegger's choir is composed of fresh, well-sounding voices, and the performances, generally, are highly meritorious. The introduction recently of Saint-Saens' Biblical opera, in oratorio form, was a bold, yet successful, venture. The work is interesting, though it may have weak points; anyhow, it was pleasant to get out of the ordinary Haydn-Mendelssohn-Gounod groove.

CONCERNING the Richter and Mottl concerts there is not very much to say. They have maintained their usual standard of excellence, and have all been well attended. Richter's rendering of Tchaikowsky's noble Symphony in B minor was one of the special features of his short season, as, indeed, it had been of previous seasons; closer acquaintance with the work enhances its great merits, and deepens the regret that so talented a composer should have departed just when his powers seemed at their fullest.

At the beginning of the year Mr. Henschel brought his Beethoven series of concerts to a successful close. A little Wagner music was introduced into the programmes, a by no means unwelcome contrast. The series included all Beethoven's Symphonies, nine of the eleven Overtures, and the Mass in D. The scheme must have been of great value and interest to many of the rising generation. Certain of the Symphonies, as I lately remarked, are given pretty often, but to hear all the nine in one season is nowadays a most rare occurrence. And yet, surely, it ought not to be thus. Speaking of the Symphonies reminds me of Sir G. Grove's excellent book, Beethoven and his Nine Symphonies, published last summer by Messrs. Novello. The writer is enthusiastic about his subject, and the volume, to say nothing of the thought and research of which it gives signal proofs, is more attractive than many a work of fiction.

OF Chamber Concerts, the Monday and Saturday Pops. have been singularly uneventful. I noticed, quite recently, the production of Miss Liza Lehmann's song cycle, “In a Persian Garden,” a work which will certainly become part of the regular répertoire. The recent performance for the first time of Grieg's Quartet in G Minor was another feature of interest. The Popular Concerts, by reason of the many excellent performers who take part in them, and also of the reputation which they have long enjoyed, are likely to continue for many years to come, yet I cannot help thinking that Mr. Chappell might issue more attractive programmes, introduce more novelties, and give greater encouragement to English art; in the first two points, his present compares unfavourably with his past.

THE British Chamber Concerts, under the directorship of Mr. Ernest Fowles, performed during their third season, which came to a close, no less than ten works by English composers. The scheme may perhaps show zeal in a good cause, rather than discretion, and yet it deserves notice and encouragement. I regret that I was unable to attend any of the present series, but hope to do better in the future. The Sunday Evening Chamber Concerts at the small Queen's Hall, under the leadership of Señor Arbos, offer welcome proof that we are beginning to take more liberal views with regard to the way of spending Sunday.

OF two operas produced last year, "Jeanie Deans" by Mr. Hamish McCunn, and "Shamus O'Brien" by Dr. Stanford, the second is by far the more interesting. English composers have been singularly unfortunate in their attempts to win operatic fame, even temporary. Some have been handicapped by their librettists, while others have lacked the qualities necessary for success in this branch of musical art. Dr. Stanford has had his failures, but in "Shamus" he seems to have infused a new and higher life into English opera. The reception given to the work was most favourable, and at the present moment Shamus is showing his tricks to the New Yorkers.

OF special musical events during the past year I may mention the reappearance of Dvorák, after an absence of twelve years to a day, as composer and conductor, at the Second Philharmonic Concert, on March 19; the appointment of Mr. F. H. Cowen to the post held in Manchester by the late Sir C. Hallé, and that of Mr. W. H. Cummings to the principalship of the Guildhall School of Music, vacant through the death of Sir J. Barnby. Among books on music, in addition to the one mentioned, I may name the Life of the late Rev. Sir F. A. G. Ouseley, by F. W. Joyce, M.A.; the useful and clearly written The Opera, by Mr. R. A. Streetfield; and Mr. F. G. Edwards's brief yet valuable History of Mendelssohn's Elijah, written in connexion with the jubilee of the composer's popular oratorio; and last, since not directly dealing with music, Miss J. L. Weston's able study of the Legends of the Wagner Drama. Of lighter books I note the following: Kuhe's pleasing Musical Recollections, Arditi's graphic Reminiscences, and the Life and Letters of Sir C. Hallé, by Lady Hallé, a work safe to find many readers.

OF prominent musicians who died during the past year I would first allude to Mme. Schumann. She was a distinguished pianist, whose gifts were acknowledged when she first visited this country in 1856. As the wife and afterwards widow of Robert Schumann her renderings of the composer's pianoforte works were of special interest. Her love for the man may have intensified her enthusiasm for his music, yet that enthusiasm existed already long before her marriage. Another foreign musician passed away, namely, the operatic composer M. Ambroise Thomas. He certainly ranks among the dii minores, yet the popularity of his opera "Mignon" in this country justifies mention of his name. And I may also add that of Richard Pohl, the translator of Berlioz' literary works into German, and an intimate friend of the French composer and of Franz Liszt, whose death occurred quite recently.

AMONG names of English musicians may be noted that of Henry Leslie, the founder of the "Leslie's Choir," famous for its performances of unaccompanied music; of Sir J. Barnby, who raised the "Royal Albert Hall Choir" to a high state of efficiency; and of Mr. Lewis Thomas, a bass singer, who for nearly thirty years took a leading part in oratorio performances.

THE late Sir Augustus Harris cannot be reckoned among distinguished musicians, yet as impresario of Covent Garden and Drury Lane he did much to further the cause of operatic music in London. He lacked neither energy nor perseverance, and sought to keep pace with the times. In the cause of Wagner he was specially active, and now that the master's operas and music-dramas are becoming popular, his services, even if not always prompted by high art motives, deserve grateful remembrance. By his death the cause of opera may have suffered a heavy blow; but it is to be hoped that during the present year some new enterprise will be started on a thoroughly sound basis, and one in which everything that is good, no matter of what epoch or school, will be granted a hearing. Though Wagner may flourish, classical opera is not yet dead, and ought to be fairly represented.

SCIENCE.

WEARY as many must be of the subject, a retrospect of the Science of 1896 must begin, chronologically as well as in order of importance, with the discovery of the Röntgen rays. It was early in January of last year that a paragraph appeared in the English press making the bare announcement that Prof. Röntgen, of Würzburg, had succeeded, by means of invisible rays from a Crookes' tube, in photographing metal objects concealed within a wooden box, and also the bones of the human hand. Many investigators in England at once repeated and verified these experiments, but it was not until the publication of Prof. Röntgen's original paper, from which the sensational announcement was extracted, that the scientific nature of the discovery was recognised. It was not an accidental or isolated experiment, repeating, as was at first thought, the previous work of Hertz and Lenard, but was part of a careful continuation and elaboration of their experiments; and the main distinctions between the Kathode or Lenard's rays and the new rays were specifically stated. It was part of the original discovery that the rays would produce fluorescence in certain substances on which they were allowed to fall, and this property was ingeniously utilised by Prof. Salvioni, of Perugia, to do away with the necessity of using photographic plates. Instead he constructed an instrument called the "cryptoscope," which enabled the shadow of the objects under examination to be thrown upon a luminous screen, and this idea, in the form of a simple disc sprinkled with platino-cyanide of barium, is now commonly used wherever it is possible to exclude daylight from the experiments.

COMPARATIVELY little has been added to our knowledge of the subject since then, although a host of workers has been engaged upon it, and innumerable papers have been published about it. The most important additions to our knowledge have lain in the employment of fluorescent screens and the discovery that Röntgen's rays will discharge an electrically charged body; but the explanation of this fact is still open to question. Prof. Röntgen discussed at the beginning the nature of his rays, and considered that they were possibly transverse waves in the ether, a theory which has not been disproved or accepted, though physicists are now more generally inclined towards the view that they are extremely short waves of light at the ultra-violet end of the spectrum. Among those whose work upon the Röntgen rays has achieved scientific recognition are Profs. J. J. Thomson, Silvanus P. Thompson, and Oliver Lodge, all Fellows of the Royal Society; a large number of other investigators, in all countries, have been engaged in extending the practical application of the discovery to the examination of the human frame, the detection of false jewels, and similar purposes without limit.

THERE have been few other great discoveries in physics and chemistry during the past year, but much interesting work. The Linde process of liquefying air by successive cumulative rarefactions has been adopted as an improvement upon the earlier method practised by Olszewski and Dewar, and it is interesting to find that it was anticipated in idea by an Englishman, William Hampson. Prof. Dewar's investigation of the electrical behaviour of metals at extremely low temperatures, in which he is associated with Prof. Fleming, has been warmly appreciated. The Bakerian lecture of the Royal Society was delivered in February by Prof. Roberts-Austen, of the Mint, and described his ingenious experiments in the diffusion of cold metals, for which the society justly awarded one of its medals for the year. In April Prof. Lippmann lectured to the Royal Society on his method of taking colour-photographs by backing a grainless sensitive film with mercury. The reflection of the rays from the mirror thus made caused an effect of "standing waves" in the film, and so altered the structure that an effect of colour, similar to that in soap-bubbles, was obtained by interference. A not less beautiful method of making colour-photographs was exhibited later in the year by Dr. Joly, whose method consists in breaking up a colourless image by means of a microscopically ruled colour screen.

IN June of last year Lord Kelvin celebrated his jubilee as Professor of Physics at the University of Glasgow, and the occasion was seized by foreign nations and by learned societies of all nations to pay homage to one of the greatest physicists of this or of any other age. In the same connexion may be mentioned the centenary celebrations of the Institute of France, which were attended by many representatives from this country, and more recently the emancipation of the Paris University by a vote of the Chamber of Deputies passed on March 5. Memorials have been promoted in honour of Huxley, Pasteur, and the organisers of the first Atlantic cables, and statues have been erected, among others, to Darwin and Lavoisier.

AN International Conference was held at the rooms of the Royal Society last July to discuss the publication of a systematic catalogue of science. Twenty-six countries sent delegates to the meetings, and a provisional course of procedure was drawn up. The publication of scientific catalogues is a matter in which the Royal Society has always taken the lead. It started a great author-catalogue in the middle of the century, and followed this up later by the present index catalogue of subjects. Of the other work done by the society during the year there is little to mention beyond an expedition to Funafuti, an atoll near the Fiji group, for the purpose of effecting a coral-boring. The work was unfortunately frustrated by mechanical difficulties. The British Association met last year at Liverpool, but produced nothing of especial note. The Royal Institution has been enriched within the last few days by the addition of a magnificent laboratory, built and equipped at the expense of Dr. Ludwig Mond, and called after the joint names of Davy and Faraday. The importance of this gift will be that it is destined purely for the work of research, and will have no teaching functions. The need of such a laboratory has been greatly felt, and its establishment should do something to meet the constant advances of German science which have threatened our industries, and which called forth a warning in the Times from no less a person than Prof. Ostwald, one of the greatest of German chemists.

IN medicine the talk is still of bacteriology. Tetanus, cholera, Indian plague, erysipelas, and even snake-bite have all been treated with greater or less success on the anti-toxin principle—that is, by injecting doses of healthy animal serum which has been rendered actively immune by gradual treatment with attenuated virus. As a strong contrast we have had in the same year an international celebration of the centenary of vaccination, and an appalling outbreak of small-pox at Gloucester, once Jenner's native place and recently the centre of the anti-vaccination crusade. The rinderpest and the tsetse-fly disease have been engaging the earnest attention of specialists at the Cape, and an excellent report on the latter, by Surgeon-Major Bruce, appeared a few months ago. Prof. Koch went out to complete the investigations last October, at the invitation of the Cape Government.

It has been an extremely interesting year, geographically, on account of the many successful explorations in Africa, in Australia, in Kafiristan, and in the Arctic regions. Among the latter Dr. Nansen's exploit has beaten all previous records, and though his ship, the Fram, did not, as was expected, drift anywhere near the Pole, Nansen himself, with one companion, penetrated on foot to a latitude of 86 deg. 14 min. Some important revelations as to the meteorological conditions, the animal life, the climate, and the imperfections of Payer's and other maps are anticipated when Dr. Nansen's book appears. Much credit belongs also to the Jackson-Harmsworth expedition, which discovered Nansen in Franz Josef Land, and which has during its long absence accumulated much valuable information. A successful exploration of Spitzbergen was carried out in the summer by a party under Sir Martin Conway. Less successful attempts to solve the Arctic secret were made by Peary in Greenland, and by Herr Andrée, whose novel idea of crossing the frozen region in a balloon was frustrated by bad weather. African geography has been enriched by the Great Rift Valley explorations of Dr. Gregory, published last year, as well as by the journeys of Dr. Donaldson Smith and others. The French have made valuable excursions through the Niger district to Timbuktu. In Australia the Horn expedition has added enormously to our scanty knowledge of the natives and animals of the remote interior of Australia, and Mr. Fitzgerald has contributed a valuable work on the New Zealand Alps.

IN the world of engineering we have to chronicle the remarkable feat of removing an old railway bridge on a British main line and replacing it with an entirely new one during the slack hours of a Sunday afternoon, an achievement as great as anything that America can claim, but one which attracted comparatively little notice. Under this heading comes also the development of the "motor-car," freed from its legal shackles on November 14, and destined henceforth to take its place among the commonplaces of road locomotion. As the year closes we read of a promising attempt to adapt Parson's steam turbine to purposes of marine propulsion, and from the time taken on the trial trip it is safe to prophesy a wider application of this wonderful piece of machinery.

ASTRONOMY has not much to record beyond the successful picking up of Brooks's comet on June 20 by M. Javelle, from an ephemeris compiled by Dr. Poor. The comet was first discovered in July, 1889. The proximity of the line of solar eclipse on August 9 induced many tourists as well as observers to undertake a journey to the north of Norway, for the most part unfortunately in vain. Good weather prevailed, however, in Japan and in Russia, and interesting results have come to light. A marked advance has been made by Mr. Lowell and others in our knowledge of the planet Mars.

H. C. M.

PETERBOROUGH CATHEDRAL.

IT is a new and pleasant feature in English life to find the fate of a fine piece of architecture become a subject of interest to many who are not students of the art. It would seem that the long period of public indifference to architecture is drawing to a close. The discovery of a new object in life has fluttered the dovescots wherein the critics generally live. With a zeal, which possibly is not tempered with knowledge many prominent followers of other arts than those of construction have, in a short time, been able to lecture on the true principles which should guide a difficult restoration. It is sport to see such a powerful team of amateurs go for the professionals. The men of experience are attacked by those of none; the owners of emotions sweep down upon the men of facts. The quarrel, as it stands, is a strange reversal of the accepted rules of life; the proverb about the man who is his own lawyer has long been accepted by the payers of fees; the climber of a big Alp takes his guide; but when a cathedral comes into sight the giddiest of heads are at home on heights where a scaffolder would fear to tread. To observe such courage is consoling; enthusiasm, although often associated with youth or with ignorance, is to be respected always; but courage and enthusiasm and eloquence are not restoration.

The point is inevitably a practical one, the question rests between those who know and those who do not, although the love of this "tottering lily of perfection" is common to both parties in the suit. Thus, we have on the one side those who have spent useful and artistic lives in designing or conserving good architecture, and on the other a group of charming sentimentalists who know not the difference between grouting and bonding, or between an arris and a soffit. The architects love the old work with a love more intimate, more filial, than that of all its forty thousand bowing acquaintances and the engineer who condemns their theory of reparation. In a world full of doubts even the approximate truth can be reached, in perilous cases like this one, only by experts whose lives have been spent amid neglected cathedrals. The true architect would preserve every old chisel mark, if any were left; would leave the weather colours in their places if sufficient mortar remained in the joints to hold the stones together; would straighten overhanging gables if the foundations were stable enough. Men who owe their reputations, their greatest pleasures, their very livelihoods, to the reverential study of ancestral work, are not those who would be guilty of matricide. The opinion of Mr. Thompson, the builder of the works connected with the cathedral he knows so well, might have some weight with an unbelieving world; but there is the additional fact that two of the most experienced and conservative architects in England, Mr. Pearson, R.A., and Sir Arthur Blomfield, recommended the course which the Dean and Chapter have decided to adopt. If through the existence of marsh land, hasty building, and the shocks of time, the west front is shivered hopelessly, it is better to retain the structural semblance of a mediæval masterpiece than to have a toppling ruin bound with temporary bandages to stay its inevitable death. Ancient buildings are not only valuable for their texture, their colour of centuries, their happy accidents of failure; the designer has still his claims: line and grouping and deep reveals and consequent shadows and mass and the controlling idea of the composer will not be lost altogether, even if interpreted by the despised British workman. The architect, who loves his elder brothers in design and reverences their genius, will see that the composition and, so to say, the drawing of the building shall remain untouched. Thus the intention of the first builders will remain as a model in design for centuries to come, and the judgment of the architects be vindicated by a stable structure.

THE BOOK MARKET.

A NEW TRADE CENTRE.

A SUBJECT which has always interested students of London is the way in which many of its streets have been specialised. Even Shakespeare could compare his scented fop in Henry IV. to "Bucklersbury in simple time." And, to-day, we have informal markets which do not escape the eye of the least observant Londoner. Thus Long Acre is mainly given over to carriage builders, St. Martin's-lane to dentists, the Tottenham Court-road to furniture, Mark-lane to cereal products, Holborn Viaduct to bicycles, Queen Victoria-street to engineering, and King William-street to insurance offices. But the wonder must still be how these segregations began. The principle is clear enough. It has been found that in a vast city like London it is more profitable to make a market and accept the fierce heat of competition than to be a needle in a haystack. The actual beginnings of such centres of trade are more obscure. Who first pitched his solitary tent where now tents whiten the ground? Who followed suit? Did the first settlers foresee the greatness of their colony? Did they in that early day grasp the principle of the market, and welcome the new comer? These things are commonly wrapped in oblivion. As well ask the conies how the warren began.

Yet now and then one is privileged to see history in the making. It can be seen now, shaping one of the minor destinies of London, in the Charing Cross-road. For here in your recurring visits or through 'bus rides you may see the nucleus—it is already a large nucleus—of what bids fair to become the most notable secondhand book market in London. The road is but some twelve years old, and for a long time no such specialisation as this seemed prepared for it. Yet even twelve years ago two secondhand booksellers found themselves side by side, and one, Mr. Bertram Dobell, is there still to tell how the street looked, and what its prospects seemed when it was thrown open in all its desolation of newness. There are now nine second-hand shops, owned by eight second-hand booksellers, on the spot. All these are packed in that straight and rather grim stretch of the Charing Cross-road between Cambridge Circus and Cranbourne-street. Four shops are side by side, and you may easily pick up a book on one man's outside stall and walk with it into his neighbour's shop to tender payment. If you do, you need not fear unpleasantness. The good feeling which is the life of every market is here, and each bookseller knows that he is being advertised by his brothers. You would pass each shop, were it alone, with only a turn of the head. Two shops together will make you cross the street, but four in a row will make you scramble down from a 'bus. Not only is the Charing Cross-road leavened now with booksellers, but others are only waiting for vacant shops to join the colony. It is very significant that nearly all the booksellers who are now settled in the Charing Cross-road have moved thither from flourishing streets in which they had long done business. Mr. Thomas Simmons, who has lately opened the large corner shop numbered 48A, was well known in Oxford-street. Mr. James Brown has concentrated here a business which he carried on in the Brompton-road and in High Holborn. Mr. Karlslake, who has a handsome double fronted shop on the left, has migrated from Bond-street.

An event yet to come, but imminent, is the removal of Holywell-street to widen the Strand. As it is, the booksellers in that long-doomed seventeenth century lane are trading either on expiring leases, or on no renewed leases at all. When the end is announced, there can be little doubt that the Charing Cross-road will be more than ever the Mecca of the second-hand bookseller. It is admirably adapted to his purpose. The mere name is a free advertisement. It carries conviction to the second-hand bookseller's best customer, the American collector and book-lover, in whose mind, as in Dr. Johnson's, Charing Cross is the centre of London life.

Moreover, rents are still reasonable in this portion of the Charing Cross-road, which, with all its centrality, has a curiously residential character—witness the enormous blocks of the Sandringham Buildings on either side of the street. Time and increased pressure of trade may send rents up here as elsewhere, but we have the best authority for saying that the outlook for the second-hand book trade in this its new centre is a hopeful one.

CORRESPONDENCE.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

The Red House, Wandsworth.

May I be allowed to put on record, through the columns of your paper, my indignant protest against the alteration by publishers of the text of an author's book without his knowledge or consent? There are five editions, dated 1895, of a book which I wrote thirty-two years ago, now offered for sale by Messrs. George Routledge & Sons, in which four outrageous alterations have been made in the text for the purpose of suiting certain engravings introduced into the more expensive editions. The book is The Life and Adventures of Robin Hood. On page 207 ten lines are inserted, giving Robin the character of a mean and contemptible rascal, which is entirely at variance with the spirit of my story. Page 334 has had three lines taken out and three inserted, which confuse the narrative in a ridiculous manner. On page 418 an incident has been wholly reversed from what I wrote; while upon page 479 eleven lines have been cut out to introduce a picture which has nothing whatever to do with the text. The story is thus twisted altogether from the purpose which I originally designed.

JOHN B. MARSH.

British Museum: Dec. 28.

At a sale at Messrs. Sotheby's last week occurred what were described as "Autograph Manuscripts by William Wordsworth; also verses on Camoens on the same sheet." The verses were undoubtedly in Wordsworth's hand; the rest of the MS. was a transcript by a copyist of Tasso's sonnet, "Vasco le cui felici ardite antenne," and of the note of some commentator. The lines in Wordsworth's writing were a translation of the last six lines of the sonnet, without any interlineation or correction. Though they evidently want the final touch, I think they should be preserved because they are Wordsworth's, and as an additional proof of his regard for Camoens, whom he enumerates elsewhere among great sonnet writers. I have added a version of the quatrains, that the piece may be complete. From the character of the handwriting, the lines would seem to have been written down in old age; and I am not quite certain of the word which I have transcribed as "Austral."

R. GARNETT.

"Vasco, whose bold and happy mainyard spread Sunward thy sails where dawning glory dyed Heaven's Orient gate; whose westering prow
the tide

Clove, where the day star bows him to his bed:
Not sterner toil than thine, or strife more dread,
Or nobler laud to nobler lyre allied,
His, who did baffled Polypheme deride;
Or his, whose scaring shaft the Harpy fled.
Camoens, he the accomplished and the good,
Gave to thy fame a more illustrious flight
Than that brave vessel, though she sailed so far.

Through him her course along the Austral flood
Is known to all beneath the polar star, Through him the Antipodes in thy name delight."

DANTE'S REFERENCE TO MOUNT ÆTNA.

Dorney Wood, Burnham, Bucks.

Dante in this passage (Par. viii. 67-70)—in which Charles Martel, eldest son of Charles II. of Naples, is represented as saying that his descendants would have been ruling in Sicily had it not been for the misgovernment of his grandfather—goes out of his way to state that the eruptions of Mount Ætna are due, not to the struggles of Typhæus, who was buried beneath the mountain, as certain of the ancients supposed (e.g. Ovid, Metam. v. 346-53), but to the presence of nascent sulphur. It looks very much as if Dante when he wrote this had just been reading the account of Mount Ætna given by Isidore of Seville (with whose works he was certainly acquainted). Isidore expressly attributes the volcanic phenomena to the presence of sulphur, which he says is ignited by the current of air driven by the force of the waves through caves in the side of the mountain communicating with the sea.

"Mons Ætna ex igne et sulphure dictus. . . Constat autem hunc ab ea parte qua Eurus et Africus flat, habere speluncas plenas sulphuris, et usque ad mare deductas; quæ speluncæ recipientes in se fluctus ventum creant, qui agitatus ignem gignit ex sulphure, unde fit quod videtur incendium" (Etym. xiv. 8).

It may be noted further that both Dante and Isidore make mention of Euris in this connexion.
PAGET TOYNBEE.

THE MEDLEVAL JEW AND RITUAL MURDER.

In reference to the above, the following graphic passage from Voltaire's Essai sur les Mœurs on the dying moments of Louis XI. of France sufficiently explains the origin of the accusation:

"Enfin sentant la mort approcher, renfermé au château de Plessis-les-Tours, inaccessible à ses sujets, entouré de gardes, dévoré d'inquiétudes, il fait venir de Calabre un ermite, nommé François Martorillo, révérend depuis sous le nom de Saint François de Paule. Il se jette à ses pieds; il le supplie en pleurant d'intercéder auprès de Dieu, et de lui prolonger la vie: comme si l'ordre éternel eût dû changer à la voix d'un Calabrois dans un village de France, pour laisser dans un corps usé une âme faible et perverse plus longtemps que ne comportait la nature! Tandis qu'il demande ainsi la vie à un ermite étranger, il croit en ranimer les restes en s'abreuvant du sang qu'on tire des enfants, dans la fausse espérance de corriger l'acreté du sien. C'était un des excès de l'ignorante médecine de ces temps, médecine introduite par les Juifs, de faire boire du sang d'un enfant aux vieillards apoplectiques, aux lépreux, aux épileptiques."

It would thus appear that it is the Jews themselves, or rather their medical men in the Middle Ages, who are in a certain way responsible for this abominable fallacy. But if I remember right, some such absurd notion was equally prevalent among the foreign leeches and charlatans Rome was swarming with under the Empire.

BOOK REVIEWS REVIEWED.

"Margaret Ogilvy," by J. M. Barrie. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

THE Speaker has a sympathetic review of the book in which Mr. Barrie has enshrined the memory of his mother. Anticipating the reference to Wordsworth's "slave prying and botanising upon a mother's grave," the writer says of Mr. Barrie: "He has written in obedience to an impulse deep-rooted in our nature to use the art whose servant he is to heap honour upon the woman whose son he was." It is marvellous how, "without the painful parade of a biographer," he has made the image of his mother to "pass rapidly before us—laughing, weeping, anxious, happy, full of household cares, and hopes beyond the grave." But delicate as it all appears, "it is really cut deep and graven hard; as lustrous a piece of work as the art of the Greek gold-workers of old." In the columns of the National Observer a "Literary Looker-on" appears to be interested principally in those parts of the work which give some account of the author's early essays in literature. "Within its pages," says the Morning Post, "we find the character of a delightful woman very fully exhibited"; in his lifelong devotion to whom Mr. Barrie enjoys "a distinction more rare and more valuable than any which his great popularity as a novelist can offer." "Nowhere in literature," says the Literary World, "can we recall such a narrative of the purest affection known on earth." The Scotman says: "The panegyric glances off the mother and dwells upon the son. A Frenchman might have written such a work without causing much surprise or reproach. . . . It is alien and offensive to Scottish human nature." So that we are glad to learn from the Daily News that it is "a fine, unique picture . . . of Scotch family life and character."

Miss Stisted's "True Life of Sir Richard Burton." (Nichols.)

"THE claim is made, apparently with justice," says the Daily Chronicle, "that upon two points the truth is told for the first time." The first of these comprises various circumstances of the marriage with Miss Isabel Arundell, including a promise that in case of his predeceasing her "no priest should be surreptitiously introduced to his death-chamber"; and the second, that at the time when the priest actually administered the sacrament of Extreme Unction Burton was dead. The Standard is far from acknowledging the justice of the claim. It sets side by side the passages in which Lady Burton and Miss Stisted respectively narrate the events, and points out the explicit contradictions. According to Lady Burton, it was after, and not before, the administration of the last rites that the doctor declared life to be extinct. "Has Miss Stisted herself either seen or heard from the doctor or the priest, or by what testimony is her counter statement supported?" "The real point is whether the uncorroborated assertion of a single writer can be accepted as conclusive proof against the general truth of Lady Burton's narrative." "The author has done her best to prejudice her own case by her tone . . . and animus . . ." "In treating of religious questions she shows a good deal of bad taste, verging at times upon vulgarity." The Pall Mall welcomes the book as "an impartial biography," agrees with Miss Stisted in her view of Lady Burton's destruction of The Scented Garden, and commends her style and moderation. "A very readable account of Burton's adventures," says the Literary World. "In scarcely one passage," writes the Daily Mail, "is Lady Burton referred to with kindness or with generosity."

NOTICE.

IN response to complaints as to the difficulty of obtaining this paper, we now publish a LIST OF AGENTS from whom "THE ACADEMY" may be obtained. Arrangements are now in progress for extending the country agencies, and a more complete list of these will be published shortly. We shall be pleased to receive applications for agencies from Booksellers and Stationers, and to supply them direct or through their London Agents.

For all People who use a Pen.

Nothing is so convenient as

Caw's Safety Fountain Pen

(Desk or Pocket size).

It can be carried in the pocket in any position.

The ink can never spill in the pocket: it is a physical impossibility for it to do so.

It has a gold nib, iridium tipped, of the finest quality—fine, medium, or broad point, as ordered.

It writes instantaneously, without shaking or dipping.

Made in several sizes. Price 12/6.

BRITISH DEPOT: 46, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C.

A Perfect Ink Pencil.

Caw's Stylographic Pen.

To those who prefer a Stylo Pen, we recommend Caw's adjustable Stylographic Pen, which adapts itself to any handwriting, and can be instantly changed in adjustment, if not quite comfortable.

Price, from 5/-.

A Perfect Lead Pencil.

The Blaisdell Self-Sharpening Pencil.

"A remarkably smart contrivance."

Black and White.

"Surely a boon to all busy people."

Westminster Budget.

"A design in lead pencils that deserves popularity."—Morning Leader.

"I hope he may make a fortune by it."—Truth.

The Blaisdell Self-Sharpening Pencil looks like an ordinary pencil, and is used like an ordinary pencil. It is the same size as an ordinary pencil. It costs no more than an ordinary pencil of the same quality.

But it lasts at the very least twice as long, because there is none of the waste that occurs through breakage of the lead in sharpening a cedar pencil. This is more especially noticeable in the case of blue and red pencils. In using an ordinary coloured pencil, probably half the crayon-lead is wasted in cutting, and another quarter by the lead breaking in use. The Blaisdell coloured pencils waste none of the crayon in cutting, for there is no cutting to be done, and the crayon does not readily break in use. Hence the saving in lead alone is very great, and the saving of time, trouble, and annoyance is greater still. There are no chips, no dirty smears from crayon dust, and a perfect point is produced instantaneously whenever needed. The same is true of the black-lead Blaisdell Pencil.

The paper covering holds firm until it is desired to remove it. Then all that is necessary is to break the outer cover with a knife or pin, and pull off a spiral of paper. The new point is then ready for use.

Blaisdell Pencils, whether black or coloured, are made in but one quality—the best; but the black-lead pencil is made in all grades of hardness for writing or drawing.

If not obtainable at your Stationer's, send for Specimens—Red, Blue, and Black, post free (in the United Kingdom), 1s.

The only Perfect Table Gum is LE PAGE'S MUCILAGE.

BECAUSE it STICKS.

BECAUSE it sticks things so that they "stay stuck."

BECAUSE it dries quicker than any gum, being practically a thin, ever-fluid glue.

BECAUSE the less you use the better and tighter it sticks.

MOREOVER, it costs no more than gum or paste, and goes ever so much further.

MESSRS. LONGMANS & CO.'S LIST.

NEW BOOK BY MR. ANDREW LANG.

PICKLE THE SPY;

Or, the Incognito of Prince Charles.

By ANDREW LANG.

With 6 Portraits. 8vo, 18s.

[Early next week.

*. This book is not a novel, though it contains the materials of romance. The subject is the mysterious disappearance of Prince Charles from February 28, 1749, practically till his father's death in 1788. These years, especially 1749-1788, were occupied in European hide-and-seek. The Ambassadors and Courts of Europe, and the spies of England, were helpless, till in 1750 a Highland chief of the highest rank sold himself to the English Government. The book contains his unpublished letters and information, with those of another spy, James Mohr Macgregor, Rob Roy's son. These, combined with the Stuart Papers in Her Majesty's Library at Windsor, the Letters from English Ambassadors in the State Papers, the Political Correspondence of Frederick the Great, and the French Archives, illuminate a chapter in Secret History. The singular story of Macalister the spy also yields some facts, and the whole exhibits the last romance of the Stuarts, and the extremes of loyalty and treason.

GOVERNMENTS and PARTIES in CONTINENTAL EUROPE.

By A. LAWRENCE LOWELL. 2 vols., 8vo, 21s.

"Mr. Lawrence Lowell has rendered a service to the student of European politics. His aim has been to explain briefly the relation between the development of political parties and the mechanism of modern government in the principal European States."—Times.

NEW NOVELS.

In crown 8vo, cloth, price 3s. 6d.

TALES of BLACK COUNTRY LIFE.

By DAVID HOBBS.

"What has been called the 'literature of locality' receives a pleasing addition in 'Tales of Black Country Life,' by David Hobbs. These tales may be commended as an interesting presentation of the working class among our Scottish ironfields."—Dundee Advertiser.

In crown 8vo, cloth, price 6s.

A MIXED WORLD.

A Novel. By ADOLPHUS POHL, Author of "Thomas Brown's Will."

"The story is a good one, but the chief charm is in the splendid little character studies with which it abounds, and the smart way in which the writer presents the truest social difficulties."—Western Daily Mercury.

NEW VOLUMES OF VERSE.

In crown 8vo, parchment cover, price 3s. 6d.

LEAVES in the WIND.

By ANTHONY C. DEANE, Author of "Holiday Rhymes," "Frivolous Verses," &c.

"These 'Leaves' we may hope will be very widely scattered, for they embody some of Mr. Deane's best work. The writer has wisely ignored the suggestion, foolishly made, that he should turn to serious themes, and continues to deal lightly with light topics."—Globe.

In crown 8vo, handsomely bound, price 4s. 6d.

MEETINGS and PARTINGS.

With other verses and Translations. By E. C. BICKETTS (CORNELIA WALLACE), Author of "Flowers: a Phantasy," and "Mountain Monarchs."

"The book throughout is gracefully written, and with a noticeable skill in versification."—Scotsman.

"There are several charming word-pictures of nature's most charming aspects, and a large number of translations, which it is a privilege to have presented in our own language."—Western Daily Mercury.

In crown 8vo, cloth, price 5s.

POEMS of LOVE and NATURE.

By CHARLES W. CAYZER, B.A.

"A refreshing oasis in the unprofitable desert of minor poets' effusions."—Public Opinion.

"Elegant in form and scholarly in expression."—Dundee Advertiser.

"Full of good work, among the best being the 'Spring Idylls,' especially those to the lark, chaffinch, and the blackbird, which are very pretty."—Liverpool Daily Post.

"The author has much facile grace of rhyming and command of different metres, and in the pages of his book is much of pretty fancy and deftness of lyrical expression."—Glasgow Evening Citizen.

THE ACQUIRED FACTOR.

Habit and Instinct. By C. Lloyd Morgan, F.G.S. (Edward Arnold.)

THE death of Huxley left an irreparable gap; it is, indeed, the common tragedy of great individualities that they do not found schools. It is with great men too often as with great trees, they overshadow and prevent their successors. And the cause of aggressive science, from overmuch reliance upon one strong champion, now finds itself leaderless. Able men in abundance there are still in the biological field, but the peculiar combination of breadth and profundity, of the expert's knowledge with a philosophical amplitude of reference and extraordinary dialectic skill, seems to be wanting. Prof. Lloyd Morgan, more than any other, serves to carry on the great tradition, but the mere comparison forces upon us the magnitude of his disadvantage. Those subtler qualities of diction, that instinctive assumption of "form" that made everything that Huxley wrote—save only those impenetrable text-books in comparative anatomy of his—literature, Prof. Lloyd Morgan does not display. His phrase is too often commonplace, he lacks much of Huxley's power and humour, there is little richness of implication in his expression; but if he does not charm he still continues to interest. And he develops his theories with an elaborated lucidity that is yet gracefully free from professorial condescension. As a whole, his book is lax, a little too tainted with the discursive encyclopædism of the text-book—in this vein, for example: "There is a point of considerable importance to which attention may here be drawn." Whereas in a well-written book attention may be drawn only where it must. Many passages are, indeed, totally irrelevant, as objectionable from the point of view of literary criticism as inoperative characters in a novel. For instance, pages 256 to 261 are devoted to a discussion on the migration of birds, a discussion that has absolutely nothing to do with the proper business of the book, the development of the mutual relations of habit to instinct. In a text-book for students, as in a course of lectures, it would doubtless be wrong to omit the matter—inconclusive though it might be; it might be all the more instructive, indeed, as an incidental discussion—but this is not a text-book for students. And the penalty of such irrelevance is a blurred impression of the main thesis.

Yet the main thesis is still sufficiently evident and sufficiently novel and far-reaching in its implications to make this one of the most important biological works, for the man of general culture at least, that last year has produced. It is a direct outcome of the important work of Prof. Weissman, work which has finally established the conviction that in the evolution of the larger and more complex animals, at any rate, the part played by the inheritance of modifications acquired by the parent is practically infinitesimal—if it operates at all. This work of Weissman, and the implications of it, necessarily affected systems of ethics and anticipations of man's material future based on biological generalisation very profoundly; among others it seriously undermines many of the propositions of Mr. Herbert Spencer. The bearing upon social work that was most immediately recognised was the discouragement with which Weissmanism threatened efforts towards social amelioration. However you turn and safeguard your criminal and your weakling—though by good fortune or good example he altogether escapes the curse of his heredity and lives a decent life to the very end—the criminal tendencies go on to his descendants as unimpaired as though he lived criminal and vicious all his days. The new teaching, indeed, seems at first glance to present the social reformer as Sisyphus. But the undeniable fact of the secular advancement of humanity is, on the face of it, antagonistic to pessimism, and Weissmanism, instead of teaching thoughtful men despair, has taught them merely that they must not overrate the inherited factor in man. An enormous mass of nonsense has been written about heredity. In certain quarters it is a synonym for Destiny. Sir Walter Besant has written of a dipsomaniac as though he was a sort of alarm clock with drunkenness instead of an alarm, wound up to go off at a specified moment of his life; and Mr. Grant Allen has, I regret to say, exceeded this in his otherwise very admirable Splendid Sin. But though in the lower types of life, heredity and material accident may make up destiny, in the higher there is a progressive development of a new factor—the acquired factor of individual habit—impressed on instinct, modifying instinct, sometimes flatly opposing instinct, and even in some cases altogether overcoming and defeating it. Prof. Lloyd Morgan's book is essentially a critical examination of the various activities of the higher animals, culminating in man, with a view to the determination of the share of these two factors of instinct and education. And the analysis, in spite of the occasional blurring irrelevance of which complaint has been made, is altogether very ably done. The matter of the bulk of the book it is impossible to deal with here, seeing it consists for the most part of records of illustrative observations interesting merely in their bearing upon their proper setting of discussion. Prof. Lloyd Morgan discusses with particular penetration and entertainment the habits, instincts, and, in fact, the whole early life of young birds, and less fully that of puppies, kittens, pigs, and other young mammals; his chapter on imitation and the acquirement of habits are in the best vein of his Animal Life and Intelligence, and so, too, is his discussion of courtship and pairing. Finally he comes to man, and it will be in his establishment of the practical emancipation of man from the operation of natural selection—selection, that is, by the systematic killing of the weakest—that, to a large number of readers, the peculiar interest of his book will certainly lie. He shows with quite admirable conviction, and with only a qualified concession to Mr. Archdall Reid, that the body of man and the instinct of man, at least of civilised man, are not at present undergoing evolution, that man is of all living things perhaps the most static, and that human evolution is a quite different process from that which has differentiated animal species, is instead the evolution of a mental environment. The development of the modern man by example, precept, subtle suggestion, the advantage of an ancient and growing tradition of living, is his real, perhaps his only difference, from his ancestor of the Age of Stone.

It is scarcely possible to overestimate the far-reaching implications of the proposition which Prof. Lloyd Morgan (to the present reviewer's mind, at least) has established. For if, that is, the course of mankind is—saving some mighty convulsion of nature—to be determined mainly by the development of a mental environment, by educational processes, then science and literature, the storehouse and factory of ideas, and the ultimate sources of all innovations, are the central and controlling facts of civilisation. And it becomes conceivable that man shall cease to be driven, a dry leaf before the wind, to fulfil his destiny. It becomes possible that intellectual men may in the future attempt to control, and succeed in controlling, to an unprecedented extent, the ideas and desires and motives of the race. Man ruling the future, that is the hope of which Prof. Lloyd Morgan gives us a measured assurance.

But these applications cannot be adequately discussed here. Sufficient has been said to show the wide interests involved in Prof. Lloyd Morgan's stimulating and suggestive book. It is a book that no one interested in the larger problem of existence can afford to neglect.

H. G. WELLS.

POLITICS AND THE ANGLO-SAXON.

Socialism: Being Notes on a Political Tour.
By Sir Henry Wrixon. (Macmillan & Co.)

SIR HENRY WRIXON was appointed by the Government of Victoria to represent the colony at the Ottawa Conference of 1894. The conference was concerned mainly with intercolonial trade relations, and with a proposal for the construction of a direct telegraphic cable between the Dominion of Canada and the Australian colonies. The Victorian representative, however, received a sort of general commission to make inquiry into such matters of public interest as might be of special importance to the Australian communities; and the result is the present volume. Within the limitations of his opportunities, Sir Henry Wrixon has done his work excellently well. Some of the chapters, as those relating to the Fiji and Sandwich Islands, betray the circumstances of hurried travel under which they were written, and disproportionate space is sometimes given to events merely because they happened to be the topics of the hour at the time of the Commissioner's visit. In compensation we have the reflections of a singularly sane and well balanced mind, after a study, upon the spot, of the political systems of England, Canada, and the United States. No one familiar with American public life could read these pages without being struck by the historical grasp and insight they display, and the lucidity with which even the most complex problems are treated. The student of comparative politics, who is so often puzzled by the very different meanings which are attached to the word "politician" in England and the United States, may here find an adequate explanation. The enormous number of voters who have to be dealt with in America entirely alters the conditions of public life. "The incessant elections and the work of committees and primaries demand the services of a class of men who give themselves wholly to it. Those who have a business or industry of their own cannot combine politics with it." Hence the men who devote themselves to politics as truly belong to a separate class as do doctors or solicitors in England. Again, the relations of the Federal and State Governments are sketched with great clearness, and the growing strength of the central authority, and the gradual weakening of the power of the separate States is illustrated in detail by reference to such incidents as the Chicago railway strike and Coxey's march. Coxey and his hungry thousands marched through State after State, just billeting themselves on the terrified people, who were only too glad to give them food in hopes of passing them on as quickly as possible to another district, and in no instance did the State authorities venture to interfere. When occasion offered, the Coxeyites captured trains, and so sped along their way. Once 500 of them were brought 400 miles in this manner. Still the local authorities declined to act, feeling that sooner or later the Federal power would be called in. This belief proved well founded, and the end was characteristic of American reverence for the forms of law.

"The army approached the city and camped a few miles out, while Mr. Coxey in his carriage, with his daughter mounted upon a cream-coloured pony, and representing the Goddess of Peace, advanced to interview the President. Unfortunately, in going up to the White House, he walked across a grass plot, in contravention of the city bylaws, and he was thereupon immediately seized, and, upon conviction, sent to prison for twenty days."

The case of the Chicago riots, in which President Cleveland, on the pretext of securing the free passage of the United States mails, sent the Federal troops into Illinois without the consent of the Governor, is, of course, fresh in the minds of everybody, and its momentous significance, as affecting the balance of powers within the American Constitution, is here very properly insisted upon.

The famous decision of the Supreme Court which led to the withdrawal of the Income Tax Law is treated at some length, but the reasons which underlay the decision seem to have been quite misunderstood. Our author says:

"The Income Tax Law, which was passed by President and Legislature, and which was immensely popular as being a burden upon wealth only, has since been declared void by the Supreme Court, on the ground that class legislation is forbidden by the Constitution."

It is quite true that the Income Tax Law as passed by Congress was a thoroughly Socialistic measure, but to say that it was disallowed on that account is completely to misrepresent the action of the Court. We say the law was a piece of Socialism because, instead of being a tax upon the whole community, with exemptions for those on whom it might press with undue hardship, it was levied only upon the wealthy. Persons having more than £800 a year were penned apart for special taxation. Some 80,000 persons out of 70,000,000 were selected for separate treatment, and though at first the tax was only at the rate of 2 per cent., there is very little doubt but that it would soon have been increased and made progressive in its incidence. The Supreme Court decided—firstly, that income from bonds of States and municipalities are not subject to taxation by the national Government; and, secondly, that taxation on the income derived from land is equivalent to a tax upon the land itself, and therefore a direct tax to be collected as the American Constitution requires. The Constitution lays down that direct taxes must be apportioned among the several States, and that "no capitation, or other direct tax, shall be laid, unless in proportion to the census herein before directed to be taken." The law then was condemned, not at all because it was a piece of class legislation—for it was allowed as far as it concerned professional incomes or incomes from personal property, as dividends from railways or other industrial concerns—but because the Constitution had said that a tax upon land should be levied not directly upon individuals but upon the several States in proportion to their population. If the tax had been levied as originally intended upon persons having more than £800 a year, in whatever part of the Union they lived, it is calculated that 19-20ths of the tax would have been paid by States having only 25 per cent. of the population, and that the four States of Massachusetts, New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania would have contributed something like nine-tenths of the whole. The method of collection which became necessary when once the Supreme Court had decided that a tax upon rent was a direct tax, in the existence of conditions of wealth distribution in the States, made the whole thing an absurdity. New States and poor States, such as Nebraska or Colorado, or the Dakotas would have had to pay as much as some of the Atlantic States in which wealth has been accumulating for generations. We have dwelt upon this question, not because it is one of the few matters in which our author has gone astray, but because of its incalculable consequence to the American people. It is almost inconceivable that a free people should permanently renounce the right of direct taxation in deference to the dead hands that wrote the Constitution. To amend the Constitution requires almost a revolution; and there remains an alternative which may prove fatally attractive. Tamper with the personnel of the Supreme Court, and it would be easy to get the decision reversed. The worst enemy of democracy might be content with such a consummation.

The chapters describing the writer's experiences in England and his intercourse with the leaders of the Socialistic movement here are both instructive and suggestive, and give opportunity for some very pungent as well as shrewd observations. Those curious persons who want to run with the hare and hunt with the hounds, and love to call themselves Christian Socialists, will find much interesting matter in the chapter in which the genuine Socialistic views as to religion, marriage, and the family are set forth, with chapter and verse.

JEFFERIES AND HIS CRITICS.

The Early Fiction of Richard Jefferies. Edited by Grace Toplis.

Jefferies' Land: a History of Swindon and its Inhabitants. By Richard Jefferies. (Simpkin, Marshall & Co.)

It is said that Ibsen, after his return from exile to Norway, confided to a friend that his early treatment at the hands of the Philistines was nothing to compare with what he was suffering from his disciples the Ibsenites. Miss Grace Toplis is a Jefferies enthusiast, and it is accordingly with an enforced grimace that we receive The Early Fiction of Richard Jefferies from her enthusiastic hands. We do not propose to waste any time in analysing these works of a boy of eighteen; they are on a level with Walt Whitman's Lingard's Temptation or Shelley's Zastrozzi—i.e., they are absolutely of no value whatever. We open Whitman's Pieces in Early Youth and read "Listen, and the old will speak a chronicle for the young. Ah! youth, thou art one day coming to be old too," &c.; we open Jefferies' Henrique Beaumont and find, "'I will be there, muttered Henrique, clenching his hand, as he re-seated himself upon the rustic bridge," &c. But we own to curiosity as to the mental equilibrium of disciples who can calmly rake out of the columns of country newspapers, boyish works which the beloved "Masters" spared no effort in life to suppress. "But Jefferies didn't forbid the re-issue of these tales," we think we hear Miss Toplis murmur plaintively. No, dear Madam, he probably did not foresee that fate had such loving and enthusiastic disciples in store for him. But let us hear the editress in her own defence. Dieu et mon droit is not the motto of the title-page, but "It required at least," says Miss Toplis, "some courage to continue a task so certain to call forth depreciatory remarks. Why, then, do these early efforts make their appearance in this permanent book form? For two reasons, the least worthy of which is that a book-lover yearns to make his collection complete, and the Juvenilia of other great writers are taken as read." We italicise these words, and stop to let this innocent murder take an outing in full daylight. Is it the yearning of the crowd then, or is it the vanity of the discovering disciple that causes the hack work and literary escapades of great writers every year to be cruelly served up to the great tasteless public? Which? Miss Toplis continues: "But the reason for the student is that they illustrate—as can be done by no comment from outsiders—the mental growth of the man, and his unusually slow development as a writer." This phrase sounds impressive and serious, like the "mental growth" from a University Extension lecture, and, bewildered, we turn back to the tale "Masked" to see why Jefferies' development, like Whitman and Shelley's, was so slow:

"'Double-dyed scoundrel,' she cried. 'Tempter, I scorn thee!'

"'Thou art wondrously beautiful,' repeated the doctor, gazing in undisguised admiration upon her.

"'Away,' cried the actress—'Away—thine eyes glitter like a rattlesnake's. I will have naught with thee, thou viper. Away!'" &c.

This close study of doctors' and actresses' and rattlesnakes' habits, no doubt, explains to Miss Toplis why Jefferies excelled later on as a writer on natural history. But we hope she will not work out the parallel in a fresh book.

Then can nothing stop the hand of the literary resurrectionist, or stay the professional tears of the merciless amateur, or the tame and frigid follies of adoring relatives? Nothing. Miss Toplis was warned beforehand: with a little gush of delight she quotes Mr. Salt's stern protest against anybody "resuscitating this poor stuff," and then she flutters off to offer to the public "these intellectual curios." No fidelity to a great author, it seems, can prevent the literary body-snatcher from calling the public round to look at the bones, the absolutely authentic bones, he has unearthed! Happy Jefferies who has escaped being exhibited in the flesh!

We say happy, because though Jefferies suffered much from worry, struggle, and the ravages of disease, though pitied by Sir Walter Besant and Miss Toplis, he had the great good fortune to live his life without the kindly aid of the interviewer. The Omar Khayyam Club does not turn down a glass to his memory amid the reverential silence of the waiters and its members. No omnivorous critic delivers valedictory addresses of touching import, recalling, by the way, how he "discovered" Jefferies, and, incidentally, how the last letter Jefferies wrote was addressed to him. No, all went well in this sense till his death, when Sir Walter Besant suddenly rushed on the scene with his Eulogy of Richard Jefferies. Sir Walter's motives, like Miss Toplis's, are unimpeachable. His Eulogy was warm and floppy. He accepted the family fiction of Jefferies' death-bed conversion to Christianity, and described how he had come "to rest," and naturally the opportunity was irresistible to the writer of The Song of the Sword. Mr. Henley, hearing the voice of the literary verger on his rounds, stepped, sword in hand, up to the good folks worshipping at the shrine. And lo! because Sir Walter Besant had patronised Jefferies for not making hay while the sun of attention shone on him, Mr. Henley must patronise Jefferies for not being a consummate literary craftsman. Says Mr. Henley:

"To come to an end with the man. His range was very limited, and within that range his activity was excessive. Yet the consequences of his enormous effort were, and are, a trifle disappointing. He thought, poor fellow! that he had the world in his hand, and the public at his feet; whereas, truth to tell, he had only the empire of a kind of back garden, and the lordship of (as Mr. Besant has told us) some forty thousand out of a hundred million of readers."—Views and Reviews.

How delicately, how thoughtfully put is that "Poor fellow!" and how beautifully the phrase, "the lordship of a kind of back garden," brings to mind the English downs and fields and forests, uninhabited by stylists, unknown to the literary craftsmen!

Mr. Henley complained that Jefferies was not an artist, but "a reporter of genius," who "would have done well to leave Hodge and Hodge's masters alone, and keep to his birds, beasts, and fishes." No, Jefferies was a poet, and take away the human element from his work and you destroy the poetry. "Has anyone ever been able to write with free and genuine appreciation of even the later novels?" asks the lady who cannot read that exquisite novel Amaryllis at the Fair, and has reprinted Henriques Beaumont for fools to laugh at. Is there not the poetical novel as well as the novel of manners? we ask; and where will you find the relation of the countryman to the soil he treads, and to the air he breathes, better recorded with living realism and living poetry than in Green Ferns Farm, The Dewy Morn, After London, Wood Magic, and Bevis? Jefferies was a poet who found his style—despite the dictums of the stylists; he was not a literary leatherstocking only, as Mr. Henley labours to prove; and the essayist who writes six clever pages on him and omits all mention of his poetry is either too angry or too superior to write the truth. What does it matter, the gush of painfully sincere disciples, and the attacks on a man's work that such indiscretions provoke? What does it matter that the novelists say Jefferies' novels are not novels, and the British public thinks they are chapters of natural history? He lived and wrote The Story of My Heart. He was the poet of the great downs and the depths of the English woods. Let that be his Epitaph. It is enough.

A GREAT BASHADOR.

A Memoir of Sir John Drummond Hay, P.C., K.C.B., G.C.M.G.; Sometime Minister at the Court of Morocco. Based on his Journals and Correspondence. With a Preface by Sir Francis W. de Winton, K.C.M.G. (John Murray.)

FOR forty years, from 1846 to 1886, Sir John Drummond Hay was at the Court of Morocco the power which the Great Elchi, Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, was at Constantinople in the days before the Crimean War. He had a perfect knowledge of the country and of its people, and for many years was looked upon by the Sultan as his most trustworthy adviser and best friend; so much so that Mulai Abderahman asked him to take charge of the conduct of Foreign Affairs on behalf of the Moorish Government in 1856. Though he never for a moment relaxed his efforts on behalf of English interests, he was regarded with implicit confidence by high and low alike; for his purity of motive, tenacity of purpose, and his ever ready and shrewd advice won the respect and good opinion of the people of Morocco. He had a wonderful knowledge of Arabic, and could speak familiarly with persons of every degree, and his love of sport endeared him to the wild tribes of the Riff coast and of the interior. For forty years he was the virtual ruler of Morocco, and his daughters have done a public service in compiling from notes and letters this record of a great man who was left in Morocco, instead of being given high office elsewhere, only because successive governments considered him absolutely indispensable in that country.

Sir John Drummond Hay was born on June 1, 1816, at Valenciennes, where his father, a major in the 73rd regiment, was on the staff of Lord Lynedoch. Sir John was educated at Edinburgh, where among his schoolfellows was A. C. Tait, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury. In 1827 he was sent to Charterhouse, and two years later his father was appointed Political Agent and Consul-General in Morocco. In 1832 Sir John was sent for by his father, and went to Tangier, where he was put under a Spanish tutor, and began to acquire his mastery of foreign languages. He afterwards travelled in Spain, and in 1838 visited England, when he applied to Lord Palmerston for a diplomatic appointment, with the result that in 1840, after a few weeks as assistant clerk at the Foreign Office, he was sent to Alexandria, where the Mehemet Ali question caused a press of work. In the same year he was transferred to Constantinople, where he was under Lord Ponsonby and his successor, Sir Stratford Canning, from whom Sir John declared he learned the art of Eastern diplomacy. In 1844 he went to England on leave, and then to Copenhagen, where he met his future wife; but as France and Morocco were on the eve of war he volunteered to go to Tangier, and arrived there shortly after the bombardment of that town by the Prince de Joinville. His father at that time was with the Court at Marakesh, and soon after his return succumbed to low fever brought on by the arduous journey and by worry and vexation. Sir John was therefore placed in temporary charge of the Consulate-General, and in 1845 was confirmed as Political Agent and Consul-General in succession to his father.

A few months after his appointment he set off to Marakesh to present his credentials to the Sultan Mulai Abderahman, and then began to acquire that influence which he continued to exercise in Morocco, even after his retirement forty years later. On his journey he frequently found it necessary to insist on his position, and to exact proper respect from the governors. As John Hay he declared he would shake hands or break bread with the poorest Moslem; but as British Agent no Moor or man should slight him. On another occasion he had to visit the fanatical governor of Azamov, and was received with great insolence, the guards squatting in double line outside the governor's kiosk instead of being drawn up in line to salute him. Some of them even had their legs sprawled out in his way, and these he trampled upon or kicked aside, much to their dismay. As he entered the governor neither rose nor saluted him, but merely held out his hand, which Sir John seized and pulled him off his seat, which was the only one in the room, immediately seating himself upon it. For a moment it was a matter of life or death; but Sir John lectured the governor on his insolence, and in the end the Moor apologised, and the two became great friends. In 1847 Sir John was promoted to be Chargé d'Affaires, and ten years later was made a C.B. in recognition of his great services in developing British trade and influence, putting down the Riffian pirates, and negotiating a Treaty of Commerce. During the war between Spain and Morocco he protected the Spanish Legation and chapel from the violence of the mob; and after he had aided in making peace, and had obtained a loan on the Customs Duties on behalf of Morocco, was made a K.C.B. in 1862. Ten years later he was made Minister Plenipotentiary, and, finally, in 1886, having reached his seventieth year, he retired from the service. He still spent his winters in Morocco, himself in writing the notes which are the foundation of this book. He died at Wedderburn Castle, Berwickshire, on November 27, 1893, and by a coincidence the halyard of the flag of the Legation at Tangier broke on the morning of his death, and the flag remained at half-mast the whole day.

A NEW ENGLAND PORTRAIT GALLERY.

Authors and Friends. By Annie Fields. (Fisher Unwin.)

IN seeking the truth about a man the testimony of an everyday friend—even after allowing for partiality and the blindness to faults that may accompany affectionate intimacy—is often more illuminative far than an array of facts, however circumstantial, marshalled by the professional biographer. Where there is love there is truth; and the secret places of a character are better lighted by a single vivid flash than by a steady uniform glow. It is Mrs. Fields's privilege to dart a few such rays. In this book she gives of some of America's most honoured writers sketches supplemental to the biographies of them that already exist. In almost every case we learn something new, for Mrs. Fields draws only upon her own experience. Given a sunny nature without guile, such as hers must be, a sympathetic intelligence, an observing eye, and a gift of clear expression, and the world must be richer. Authors and Friends is not in any sense a great book, nor does it deal with the greatest, but it is wealthy in very excellent human nature, a little over proof.

Mrs. Fields (who is the widow of the American publisher and poet, James T. Fields) writes best of Longfellow, Holmes, and Whittier, because it was these that she loved best. With Emerson and Tennyson she was less at home. Altogether we are most interested in her picture of the Autocrat. Holmes was in himself so charming a man that nothing written about him can fail to carry charm with it. Even the recently-published Life of him, dull though the author made it, is still a book to prize; though we hasten to counsel all people who possess it to buy Mrs. Fields's book too, by way of filling in the chinks left by the more formal biographer. For instance, Mrs. Fields tells how, in his younger days, Holmes liked to be called Professor (thus, by the way, differing from Matthew Arnold and that Oxford scholar who, on being addressed in that style by a correspondent, exclaimed, "Why will he call me Professor? I can't cut hair, and I don't know any conjuring tricks!") and this simple fact is more instructive than pages of text. Some of Mrs. Fields's stories of the Autocrat are well found. Thus, on being asked what he thought of a certain lecture, "Yes, yes," said Dr. Holmes, "I don't doubt it was very good; but the speaker is such an unpleasant person! He is just one of those fungi that always grow upon universities!" Again, in his old age, a careful maid once asked if he minded climbing two flights of stairs to see a rich friend. "I laughed when she asked me," he said; "for I shall have to climb a good many more than that before I see the angels." The Longfellow stories are illuminative too: when a refusal of any kind, says Mrs. Fields, became necessary, it was wonderful to see how gently it was expressed. A young person having written from a Western city to request him to write a poem for her class, he said, "I could not write it, but tried to say 'No' so softly that she would think it better than 'Yes.'" Once an autograph-hunter wrote saying that he "loved poetry in most any style," and would Mr. Longfellow "please copy his 'Break, break, break,' for the writer?" Here is a scrap of a letter from Whittier:

"Were I Autocrat, I would see to it that every young man over twenty-five and every young woman over twenty was married without delay. Perhaps, on second thought, it might be well to keep one old maid and one old bachelor in each town, by way of warning, just as the Spartans did their drunken helots."

And Mr. Fields conjures up a curious picture of the Quaker poet when she tells how, in speaking of Rossetti's ballad of "Sister Helen," Whittier "confessed to being strangely attracted to this poem because he could remember seeing his mother, 'who was as good a woman as ever lived,' and his aunt performing the same strange act of melting a waxen figure of a clergyman of their time."

We cannot always quite agree (yet why should we?) with Mrs. Fields. It is when she indulges more than usual in what has been called the American habit of "cynifying geese" that we disagree most. Thus, in writing of Celia Thaxter, she says, "While White's Selborne, and the pictures of Bewick, and Thoreau's Walden, and the Autobiography of Richard Jefferies endure, so long will Among the Isles of Shoals hold its place with all lovers of nature." This is not sound criticism. In classing Jefferies's Story of My Heart with these other works Mrs. Fields commits a grave error, and we also doubt the truth of her prophecy. Moreover, the book, which is mainly a collection of articles contributed to magazines, might have been more carefully revised. Thus we find on p. 96 this story: "After an agreeable conversation with a gentleman who had suffered from ill-health, Emerson remarked, 'You formerly bragged of bad health, sir; I trust you are all right now?'" and, on p. 309, Mrs. Fields records that Emerson was once heard to say to Whittier solicitously: "I hope you are pretty well, sir! I believe you formerly bragged of bad health." These being probably the same story, one version should have been omitted. But we wish to say nothing in dispraise of so very kindly a book.

AN ASTRONOMER-ROYAL.

The Autobiography of Sir George Biddell Airy, Astronomer - Royal, 1836 - 1881. Edited by Wilfrid Airy, B.A. (Cambridge University Press.)

"THE ruling feature of Sir George Airy's character," says his son, the editor of these memoirs, "was undoubtedly order."

"From the time that he went up to Cambridge to the end of his life his system of order was strictly maintained. He wrote his autobiography up to date soon after he had taken his degree, and made his first will as soon as he had any money to leave. His accounts were perfectly kept by double entry all his life, and he valued extremely the order of book-keeping. . . . He seems never to have destroyed a document of any kind. . . . He sometimes spoke of mathematics as a system of order carried to a considerable extent."

Such being the character of the man we have to deal with, one is naturally prepared beforehand for a large amount of method in the memoirs he has left; yet even so the realisation cannot fail to surprise one. It carries us back over sixty or seventy years to the every-day life at Cambridge with a minuteness that would be trivial were it not so startling. Whewell and Adam Sedgwick were undergraduates in those days, and Airy's most intimate friends, continuing so right on till death removed first one and then the other. Of Airy's own story, the main point here, we may begin by saying that he was of humble origin, but born with a genius for mathematics. His first tutor was little more than a foil for his intellect. At Cambridge his life was a series of successes, tempered by a somewhat severe struggle for existence. Fellowships and tutorships were his almost for the asking, and that at Trinity, in the days of Whewell! He was elected co-Fellow with Macaulay, and beat the great Babbage in a contest for the Lucasian professorship. The latter post determined the bent he had long felt towards astronomy, as it carried with it the control of the Cambridge Observatory, from which he made but a step to Greenwich, on the retirement of Mr. Pond.

As a sample of the system on which Airy's undergraduate life was conducted, the following passages are instructive—he would be a bold man who could fearlessly add amusing:

"On February 1 I commenced two excellent customs. One was that I always had on my table a quire of large-sized scribbling paper sewn together, and upon this everything was entered: translations into Latin and out of Greek, mathematical problems, memoranda of all kinds, the latter generally with the date of the day. This is a most valuable custom. The other was this: as I perceived that to write Latin prose well would be useful to me, I wrote a translation of English into Latin every day.

"Among miscellaneous matters, I find that on March 22 of this year I began regularly making extracts from the books of the Book Society, a practice which I continued to March, 1826.

"I cannot tell precisely in which year I introduced the following useful custom. Towards the end of each year I procured a pocket-book for the following year, with a space for each day, and carefully examining all the sources of elements of observations. . . . I inserted them in the pocket-book."

These quotations serve to show what sort of qualities Airy brought to bear on his work and on the successive offices he enjoyed, and if, as his son asserts, his passion for order grew at the end of his life so great that he thought more of docketing his letters than of reading them, it had at least this merit, that it enabled him to reform and set an example for the systems of all European observatories.

To an outside reader, Airy's Cambridge life, with its record of great names, its enthusiasms, and its variety, will be interesting or not according as it strikes a sympathetic or unsympathetic chord; but inasmuch as it would never have been published if Airy had not been made Astronomer-Royal, we are bound to regard it as less important than the latter part of the volume. Airy was a model Astronomer-Royal. He brought to the work an untiring intellect, a marvellous memory, of which he was very proud, an endless capacity for work, and a stern sense of duty. The Observatory, if not quite an Augean stable when he took it, was suffering from very lax management and required thorough reform. Airy's rigid system of order was a sovereign cure for laxity. In the course of his long possession of the office he made on the whole few mistakes, and only one bad one, that being his failure to recognise the discovery of Neptune by Adams. Airy's journal admits that in regard to this matter he was "savagely attacked," but does not furnish such a full or ungrudging explanation as we should have liked to see. For the rest, he brought the observatory under his charge to a wonderful state of efficiency, and linked it to several utilitarian projects. Among these was the distribution of solar time by means of time balls and governed clocks. Airy also carried out the experiments required to determine the error of compasses in iron ships, and the variation of density below the earth's crust. He interested himself in bridge building, in drainage schemes, in decimal coinage, and the institution of standard weights and measures. His private life was a model of simplicity and domestic affection. Taken all round, he was one of a rare type of men of whom the world may well be proud—men whose devotion is stronger than their inclinations, and whose habits have been grown in the school of severe self-discipline.

SPECIMEN PROSE.

English Prose Selections. Edited by Henry Craik. Vol. V. "Nineteenth Century." (Macmillan & Co.)

WITH this instalment Mr. Craik brings to a close a difficult and important task. The English Prose Selections must naturally challenge comparison with the four volumes of The English Poets, edited some years ago by Mr. Humphrey Ward, for the same publishers. But it is a comparison in which the younger enterprise is at many a disadvantage. Our prose literature is of much greater bulk and much less easy to ransack than our poetry; it lends itself much less readily to selection; and when the greatest names are set aside, there is much less unanimity as to who deserves admission, who exclusion. Moreover, although Mr. Craik has been able to secure the help of a body of competent critics, he could hardly match the authority and the persuasiveness of such names as Mark Pattison, Matthew Arnold, and Walter Pater, all of whom appear on Mr. Ward's list. Matthew Arnold may indeed be looked upon as the inspiring genius of the scheme. To-day, though we have critics in plenty, we have no such golden interpreters.

Nevertheless, Mr. Craik's knowledge and industry have produced a good book; not merely a good anthology—in itself an excellent thing, to our notion—but also a good introduction to a side of English literature which has hardly received its fair share of attention. For in spite of the pioneer work of Prof. Minto and Prof. Saintsbury, and Mr. Henley and Mr. Arthur Galton, and many another, the development of our prose style is a subject still in need of its erudite and epoch-making historian, who, when he comes, will certainly find much valuable material ready to his hand in the selections and essays of Mr. Craik's five volumes. Looking back over the work now happily complete, we have nothing but praise for the labour and skill that have been lavished upon it. The selections are nearly always well-chosen, the criticism is practical and discriminating. The introductory chapters to each period are full of matter, and even more full of suggestion. In the present volume the lion's share of the work is, as usual, taken by Mr. Craik himself and his three principal coadjutors—Prof. Saintsbury, Ward, and W. P. Ker. The first and last of the four must really share the laurels of the whole book; they have been uniformly sensible, lucid, and helpful. Prof. Ward, although learned and painstaking, has not the same knack of giving literary form to his disquisitions, while of Prof. Saintsbury we are beginning to feel that there is no longer any subject under the sun on which he has anything to tell us that he has not told us before. Among the younger men, praise is due to Mr. Beeching who writes on Church and Newman, and Prof. Raleigh, to whom Charlotte Brontë and Louis Stevenson are allotted. Good work is also done by Prof. W. M. Dixon. Mr. J. H. Millar, on the other hand, distinguishes imperfectly between criticism and reviewing. It is not really permissible to "slate" J. S. Mill. The only other fault we have to find is that one volume, bulky though it be—the present one amounts to 780 pages—is not proportionately sufficient space to devote to the immense mass of nineteenth century prose. The selections from many of the writers dealt with are inadequate in number. Lamb, De Quincey, and Landor are among the sufferers; and one seems to detect herein a sign of Mr. Craik's austerer taste, nourished upon eighteenth century models, and wincing at any approach to the Asiatic in style. The best and most comprehensive of editors has his personal equation.

TWO BIBLIOGRAPHICAL BOOKS.

A Bibliography of Guns and Shooting. By Wirt Gerrare. (Roxburghe Press.)

THIS is, on the whole, a disappointing book. It is true that every special bibliography, even the worst (which this is far from being), is of more or less use to those whom it concerns; and there is abundant evidence that the author of the present work is genuinely interested in his subject and has devoted considerable labour to the accumulation of material. But it is impossible to shut one's eyes to the fact that the book as it stands has serious defects. The chief of these are: the want of a clearly defined limit to the subject treated of, a needlessly complicated arrangement, and a want of method, of accuracy, and of proportion in the separate entries. With regard to the first of these points, the book seems intended to bridge over a gap between purely military bibliographies and those dealing exclusively with sport, but it trespasses to a certain extent on both these subjects, especially the latter, so that even with the aid of the preface it is difficult to ascertain what is or should be included or rejected. This defect would be less apparent if the arrangement adopted for the book were as satisfactory in practice as it seems in theory. Accuracy, we are sorry to say, is much to seek in the treatment of the several entries. The foreign titles especially are in a far too large proportion defective either in grammar ("Machinis bellicis, Heronis mechanici," is one entry; see also, among a hundred others, Nos. 11, 101, 121) or spelling: some (e.g., Nos. 613, 1901) resemble nothing so much as extracts from a third-rate second-hand bookseller's catalogue. Some entries are repeated (as Nos. 155, 175) with fresh blunders: no less than a page and a half is devoted to the Maison Rustique, a book which is only in the most remote degree connected with shooting: the treatment of MSS. is grossly inadequate, and the author's invariable practice of inserting his own remarks between the title of the book and the imprint, in the same type, is confusing. The book is well got up on the whole, but the absence of a date on the title-page is quite inexcusable.

Catalogue des Bibliographies Géologiques.
Rédigé par Emm. de Margerie. (Paris.)

THE size of this catalogue of geological bibliographies, a portly volume of over 750 pages in octavo, is sufficient to show to what an enormous bulk the literature here summarised has grown, and the need of a trustworthy guide to thread its mazes. The work is admirably done, and the Bibliographical Committee of the International Geological Congress, which promoted and publishes the book, and M. de Margerie, its editor, to whom the credit of its execution almost wholly belongs, may be congratulated on having achieved a really noteworthy and useful task. The work of compilation, as we learn from the preface, was assigned to eminent geologists of the principal nations, and before the end of 1892 all the titles, 2,430 in number, had been sent in to the editor. The inevitable result followed. Each worker had executed his part on a different system and scale from the others, and M. de Margerie was compelled to recast the whole. In doing so, he was able to add almost 1,500 titles to those sent in, the final total being 3,918. Those who know by experience how heartbreaking is the task of rewriting other people's work will be best able to appreciate M. de Margerie's success in reducing, by four years of constant labour, his materials to order and cohesion. The arrangement is carried out on broad lines and with as much simplicity as the volume of matter to be dealt with and the nature of the subject allow; and the only suggestions that we should have felt inclined to offer have been anticipated by the editor in his preface. The greater convenience of arranging the bibliographies of geological writers in a single alphabet has been foregone in order to keep the work of each contributor separate as far as possible. This reason is not so convincing as it would have been had not so large a proportion of the material been due not to joint labour, but to the editor; and the disadvantages of placing the writers under their several countries are sufficiently obvious. The scantiness of the indices at the end is not likely to lessen to any appreciable extent the usefulness of the book as a whole.

LITERARY ARTICLES IN THE MAGAZINES.

THE popular impression concerning Lamb is that he was a poor man. The essay entitled "Old China" is probably the basis upon which this theory rests, supported, also, by our knowledge of the frugal habits of Elia and his sister, and the sparse figure cut by the essayist in all pictures of him. It appears, however, from an article in Macmillan's Magazine, that Lamb was, during the later years of his life, by no means needy. Although, it is true, he began at the East India House in a very modest way with (after his probationary period was ended) the identical amount upon which Goldsmith's vicar passed for rich, he rose in the twenty years following to £240. Then, in 1815, a re-organisation took place, and Lamb came out of it the receiver of £480 a year, a sum which steadily increased until, in 1821, it reached £700, remaining at that figure until just before his retirement, when it became £730. On his retirement, after thirty-three years of service, Lamb was granted a pension of £441 per annum. When it is remembered that there were various methods of making extra money at the India House, and also that Lamb's literary work was well paid for, it will be seen that he was—latterly, at any rate—in no very pitiable plight.

Another writer in Macmillan's places novelists of Irish life under review, from Maria Edgeworth to Mr. Frank Mathew. In these two extremes, indeed, he finds his best examples, although between them come Lever and Lover, Gerald Griffin and Le Fanu, Miss Lawless and Miss Barlow. In Mr. Mathew the Irish novelist of the future is discovered. "Ireland," says the writer, "though she ought to count herself amply justified of her children, is still complaining that she is misunderstood among the nations; she is for ever crying out for some one to give her keener sympathy, fuller appreciation, and exhibit herself and her grievances to the world in a true light. The result is that kind of insincerity and special pleading which has been the curse of Irish literature." The Irish novelist of the future must have more style and more fidelity to facts.

In her essay upon "Ethics and Literature" in the Contemporary Review Miss Julia Wedgwood contrasts Stevenson and Scott very interestingly. Her subject is the positive influence for morality which is wielded by the novelist, and the change that has come over the fiction which belongs to a period the beginning of which was Darwin's great discovery. Mr. Meredith and George Eliot are cited as examples of a non-moral (not immoral) and a moral writer. Miss Wedgwood next turns to Stevenson, whom she ranks with Mr. Meredith as a non-moral novelist, and compares his method in his last story, Weir of Hermiston, with that of Scott in a similar story. Stevenson has "entire scientific impartiality: he describes good and bad in the same tones." No one ever felt Scott to be cold. No doubt, says the critic, he who echoes the exact dialect of the hour is easiest to read; but Scott will, she considers, be considered by posterity the truer artist of the two. Miss Wedgwood, whose essay is worthy attention as careful as her own preparation of it, continues with some remarks concerning Shakespeare. Here is a passage:

"We speak of the universal sympathies of Shakespeare, but they are not universal in any other sense than this. In truth, we should feel any modern novelist who worked within so restricted a framework as his extremely narrow. The range of his art leaves untouched a large part of human interest; many people lead full and useful lives, and never know anything of a single emotion made immortal by his genius. . . . He lived at the high tide of the Reformation, and he never gives us a Catholic or a Protestant; he lived in the full current of the Renaissance, and he never represents a student or a printer; he lived when the artist was an honoured guest at Courts, and he never introduced an artist. Is it, then, by stupid flattery that we talk of his infinite variety? By no means. It is because within this narrow range his sympathies are absolutely elastic. He makes us sympathise with Macbeth, and with the enemies of Macbeth—with Julius Cæsar, and with the murderers of Julius Cæsar. He paints the conqueror of Agincourt, and he echoes the remonstrance of his rank and file."

In Scribner's, next a story entitled "The Bashfulness of Bodley" (which is an alliance one had never suspected), we find an account of Victor Hugo's home in Guernsey by G. Jeannot, the artist, who was taken to the island by the wish to come more thoroughly into sympathy with the author whose romances he has illustrated. Hauteville House has often been described before, though not more interestingly than by M. Jeannot, who considers Hugo's exile no disadvantage to him, in that it is reasonable to believe that to him "the expansive power of this volcano had acquired a far greater explosive force by being concentrated in so small a space." The following passage contains no new statement, but it may well be printed here:

"Two immense H's form the central ornamentation [of the dining-room], which is surmounted by a Virgin of porcelain holding the infant Jesus in her arms. This is unexpected enough. On either side are two beautifully shaped vases; and above, in the old oak of the cornice, are written these lines, which seem to apply to the Virgin, and to make of her a kind of Goddess of Liberty:

"Le peuple est petit, mais il sera grand;
Dans tes bras sacrés, ô mère féconde,
O Liberté sainte, au pas conquérant,
Tu portes l'enfant qui porte le monde."

FROM CROWDED SHELVES.

Shapes in the Fire. By M. P. Shiel. "Key-Notes Series." (John Lane.)

MR. SHIEL'S book is one of those peculiarly irritating to a reviewer. He has undeniable talent. The story called "Maria in the Rose Bush" is quite good. The relations of the artist Deianeira, morganatic Gräfin von Hohenschwangau, on the one hand to the painter Albrecht Dürer, on the other to her own hard-riding warrior husband, are finely conceived, and worked out with scholarship and a sense of style. The other six stories we can regard only as utter foolishness. Mr. Shiel has apparently striven beyond all things to be eccentric. By extravagance of expression, by a liberal coinage of impossible and ugly words, by an ostentation of occult and intricate lore, he has sought to create an impression of Poe-like mystery and luxury. Of unbridled fancy we find much in the book; of vital, fusing imagination very little. At his best, Mr. Shiel is incomprehensible; at his worst, as in the preface, he descends to the sheerest impertinence. We regret to see real powers so squandered, and can only trust that a time may come when Mr. Shiel will take into his head the new whim of treating his art seriously.

In the Garden of Peace. By Helen Milman. (John Lane.)

THIS is a book more for the lover of birds even than for the lover of flowers, for the garden was a birds' paradise. "Peas may be a delicious dainty, but what are peas to the song of a blackbird, or the glint of green in the sunlight as a green finch flits across the garden?" So says Miss Milman somewhere. "Green peas can be purchased for a paltry sum," she adds, "but untold gold will not bring the birds as they come to us." Therefore the birds were allowed to do as they liked, and in return they gave Miss Milman the freedom of their nests, and sang to her all day, and carried her thoughts to quiet places. She writes of these, her friends, with grave charm. From the security of her sylvan sanctuary she watched them at all hours, entering into their very souls, and here is the record of her observations. The quiet life of an old retired garden was never better set down: the book is true to its beautiful title. One of the prettiest chapters is called "Apartments to Let," and tells of the nesting of a pair of big tits. They looked at a square box on the sill of Miss Milman's window, went away, came again, and took possession. But for three days they did nothing but drop a little moss in. On the evening of the third day, however,

"Mother Big Tit took up her abode there, and said to her mate that the following morning he must really get to work at a proper nest, and stop fooling about, for she meant business and was going to lay an egg. This thoroughly frightened him."

The eggs were laid and hatched.

"We'll never have a large family again, my dear," said the father, as he dropped a big green caterpillar into the gutter by mistake. 'I can't think why you lay so many eggs.' 'Because I like to be a credit to my race,' answered the mother, as bravely as she could."

Leaving birds for the moment, Miss Milman turns to the beds:

"To one who has a garden soul," she says in one place, "the grouping of flowers becomes not only a labour of intense love, but a distinct art. And I would have you cast as much thought on the arrangement of colour as an artist would on his model's drapery. . . . Above all things, bear in mind that colour is what a garden stands in need of most; and the colour must be in masses, in different shades if you like, but in sufficient quantity to attract the eye at once. . . . Round an old Elizabethan house you would plant a border of eucalyptus and nicotina, rosemary and China roses, so that, leaning out of your window at night to hold communion with the stars that sprinkle the blue, a sweet scent would be wafted to you, to tempt you to dream of the flowers." [This, in December, is maddening!] . . . "Let everything be planted with a meaning. I stand white Madonna lilies as sentinels at the entrance of my rosary. . . ."

These passages give a hint of Miss Milman's quality. The book has a number of Mr. E. H. New's vivid drawings, which, in their way, are as welcome and pleasant as the text.

On the Broads. By Anna Bowman Dodd. (Macmillans.)

THE patronage of the public is the only possible justification for the appearance of such a book as this. On the Broads, which is a record of a brief holiday spent on the inland waters of Norfolk, contains no information likely to be of the slightest use to intending visitors, nor has it sufficient literary merit to atone for its practical deficiencies. Miss Dodd, it is true, makes no pretence of writing a book of interest to the yachtsman; her knowledge of seamanship is admittedly of the meagrest; but her portraits of sailors equally lack verisimilitude and vigour, and her wherry-men speak of "tying in their sheets," and accomplish such impossible feats as "sailing right round an oblong broad without tacking." She has considerable descriptive power, but her observations are neither novel nor minute, and her finest pictures breathe more of the sensuous atmosphere of a Southern rose-garden than of the silent and mysterious Broads, with their perpetual twilight, their chilly exhalations, and their indefinable sense of distance and obscurity. A pretty love-story gives a certain cohesion to the book, but scarcely a page is unmarred by trivial generalities and meaningless witticisms. Mr. Joseph Pennell's illustrations amply compensate for the deficiencies of the text. Mr. Pennell has seized, and the printer has reproduced, with extraordinary skill the peculiar features of the Norfolk landscape. The drawings of "Horning Ferry Inn" (p. 101), "On the Yare" (p. 275), and "Cantley Regatta" (pp. 311, 317) are a revelation, and alone constitute a sufficient justification of the artist Reynard's description of the Broads as "the most paintable country in existence." On the Broads is well worth buying for the sake of its illustrations alone.

Luther's Primary Works, together with his Shorter and Larger Catechisms. Translated and Edited by Henry Wace, D.D., and C. A. Buchheim, Ph.D. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

IN the critical year of grace 1520 Luther made a threefold appeal against certain contemporary doctrines and doings. To the Pope he explained, in the "Treatise on Christian Liberty," what he held to be the cardinal truths of Christianity. In the "Address to the Nobility" he appealed to abuses and exactions as evidence of the need for reformation, and thrust against the "three walls" by which the authority of the Church was fortified: that the Temporal Power had no jurisdiction over the Spirituality; that none might interpret the Scriptures but the Pope; and that none but he might summon a Council. The treatise "On the Babylonish Captivity of the Church" is addressed to his friend Hermann Tulichius: that "the Papacy is the mighty hunting of the Bishop of Rome" is its burden; and with every weapon to his hand, with ridicule and with Scripture texts, he hacks therein at the developments of the sacramental system. From whatever point of view the reader approaches these documents, even at a distance of three centuries, and when the questions they trenchantly discuss are for all the world finally settled one way or the other, he cannot remain insensible to the fiery spirit by which they are informed. They set their mark upon an epoch, and are well worthy, even in these last days, of the conscientious pains which the editors have effectually bestowed upon the rendering of them. The volume includes a sympathetic but temperate essay upon Luther's "Primary Principles" from the pen of Dr. Wace, and the "Political Course of the Reformation in Germany" is treated by Dr. Buchheim.

MR. JOHN MURRAY issues the ninth edition of his Handbook for Travellers in Lower and Upper Egypt. It is edited by Miss Mary Brodrick with the assistance of Prof. Sayce and Captain H. G. Lyons, R.E., and the editor acknowledges the valuable aid of other specialists. It is impossible to look through this handy volume, handy with its thousand pages, without admiring the completeness and compression everywhere manifest. Considering our connexion with Egypt, this work is much more than a guide-book; and its place is the shelf at home not less than the traveller's valise.

The Catholic Directory, of which the sixtieth annual issue is to hand (Burns & Oates) contains particulars of every Roman Catholic diocese in England, the Catholic Hierarchy, lists of Catholic peers and Members of Parliament, the Ecclesiastical Calendar for England and Wales, and a mass of other official information respecting Catholic education and the Catholic Press.

POETRY.

POPE LEO XIII.'S NEW POEM.

KINGS have been versifiers often; but Pontiffs rarely. St. Damasus in the fifth century was something of a poet—the laureate of the Catacombs. But the present Pontiff is the most various and considerable versifier of all the Petrine line. "Peter in Metre" might head an article of some bulk about the excellence of his Latin style, illustrated by quotations which range, in time of composition, from 1822 to this very last Christmas Day, when a set of historical verses owning his high authorship was read out by the Archbishop in the Cathedral at Reims. How many a minor poet must envy the Pope his opportunities—prelates to read his lines from minster pulpits to the assembled citizens.

The cracked-plate theory applies also to a sickly constitution—it often lasts longest. The Pope is more than eighty-seven years of age; but when he was only twenty he composed some verses on his health—you would say the health of a dying man. He addresses himself when he says:

"Wakeful till latest night, thy limbs in vain Court needful rest; nor sleep nor food restore
The strength unknown—thine eyes, all darkened o'er, Dejected sink, while racked the head with pain.

"Fever consumes thee; chill, as ice congeals, Or parched with burning thirst. Pallid as death
Each several feature; toils the weary breath—
Through all thy fainting form the languor steals.

"Why dream of future years with promise bland,
While Fate swift urges? Then I said:
'No fear
My spirit shall quell! Death draws, indeed, so near?'
Cheerful I wait, to grasp his bony hand.

"No fading joys allurements offer now;
All undelayed I pant for bliss supreme!
Glad as when wanderer's footsteps home return,
Or sailor when to harbour veers his prow."

There, where you least expect it, is the note of Mr. Henley and of Stevenson. "No fear my spirit shall quell," says the Pope in the mood of Mr. Henley's "I am the captain of my fate"; and Stevenson's "Gladly I die," with his sailor home from the sea and his huntsman home from the hill, has an almost exact counterpart in the closing lines of Leo XIII.'s early verses.

Later, but still with Death as a friend in view, the Pope composed some lines as an inscription on his own portrait. Later still his muse became less personal. He tried, for instance, a stanza on photography:

"Man doth new power to the sun impart;
Nature and science here combine:
Strive he with all but matchless art,
Apelles' touch must yield to thine."

That may be bad sentiment for the portrait-painter; but the Latinity of the expression is very nearly perfect.

The latest poem of Leo XIII. is also the longest. Nineteen stanzas of four lines each constitute the Ode on the fourteenth centenary of the baptism of Clovis. The event took place at Reims—hence the appropriateness of the commemoration there. The various verses review events of French history; and they are particularly curious as illustrations of the partiality of the reigning Pontiff for France—the only country, except his own, whose language he can speak with fluency and whose literature he can read. England, however, will hardly resent, and Mr. Andrew Lang will hail, the allusion to Joan of Arc, who found "In Heaven the strength whereby she drove from France

The English sword and lance."

But Germany, who has more recent memories, is conscious that this said Clovis sung by the Pope was he who was victorious over the Teuton, and the first two lines of the stanzas which close the poem, despite the pious proviso which follows, may yet be a nursery of international jealousies:

"For ever, while the ages shall advance,
Flourish above all lands the land of France!
Provided that the Holy Faith be still
The goal of all her will:
Nothing before Christ's faith; nor fortunate Is sought for long without it. Hence your state
Drew her old fame. And may this still be all
The glory of the Gaul!"

The Year of Shame. By William Watson.
With an Introduction by the Bishop of Hereford. (John Lane.)

You have ten pages of preface from the Bishop of Hereford, and one page of "author's note" from "W. W." himself (the poet doubtless delights in the use of the initials that were Wordsworth's too), before you come to a dedicatory sonnet "To a Lady," a daughter of Ireland, who is urged to put aside the sorrows of her own land,

"And mourn with me an ancient Orient race Outcast and doomed and disinherited"; and then you are with "the Turk in Armenia" face to face. The situation is familiar; and Mr. Watson has made it so. England may be said to know by heart much that is here put into her hands. "Sixteen of the sonnets," says Mr. Watson, "are here reprinted—in some cases with alteration—from my pamphlet, The Purple East. The remaining pieces have not appeared before—except in newspapers!" The mark of exclamation is our own; and we leave it to the poet to settle with the editors of the Daily Chronicle and the Daily News this question of the relative publicity of a pamphlet and a paper. "Except in newspapers"—where else could they possibly appear with so much prominence and in such enormous duplication? It is because they have so appeared that they are now familiar almost beyond this business of reviewing. The stately lines headed "How weary is our heart" have been printed already in our own columns.

Mr. Watson's fine qualities as a poet, which these verses admirably illustrate, are also familiar by now. Not all poets have merits that are so obvious. We do not mean by that to say that they are cheap. He is a most stately composer; his diction is limpid as it is elegant; and if the philosophy of rhyme is rightly defined as a pleasant exercise and marriage of memory and expectation, then Mr. Watson has popularised that philosophy. Among living poets he is one whom the greatest number of persons prefer to read for satisfaction to the mental ear. He never disappoints with faulty metre, or fails you in musical line or sounding rhyme. Such qualities are the very ones that serve a poet who is the patriot too. He is so restrained and masterly an artist that his rare violence ought to command respect and to compel thought. His message goes out broadcast; and, but for "The Plague of Apathy" that he laments, there must somehow come a response to such lines as those that appear with that heading:

"THE PLAGUE OF APATHY.

"The dewfall of compassion, is it o'er
So soon? So soon is dead indifference come?
From wintry sea to sea the land lies numb.
With palsy of the spirit stricken sore,
The land lies numb from iron shore to shore.
The unconcerned—they flourish; loud are some,
And without shame. The multitude stand dumb.
The England that we vaunted is no more.
Only the witling's sneer, the worldling's smile,
The weakling's tremors, fail him not who fain Would rouse to noble deed. And all the while
A homeless people, in their mortal pain,
Toward one far and famous ocean isle Stretch hands of prayer, and stretch those hands in vain."

Even more appealing is the longer poem, "The Awakening," with its closing invocation to England:

"THE AWAKENING.

"Thou art a star among the nations yet:
Be thou a light of succour unto them
That else are lost in blind and whelming seas.
Around them is the tempest; over them
Cold splendours of the inhospitable night,
Augustly unregardful: thou alone
Art still the North Star to the labouring ship,
In friendless ocean the befriending orb,
And if thou shine not, whither is she steered?
Shine in thy glory, shine on her despair,
Shine lest she perish—lest of her no more Than some lorn flotsam of mortality
Remain to catch the first auroral gleam,
When in the East flames the reluctant dawn."

Why, then, does not England dance to this piping? Because, we must suppose, it does not imagine that poetry means anything. To say a thing in rhyme as well as Mr. Watson says it is to say it to pleased ears, but to a heart steeled to defiance; and we dare to predict that Lord Salisbury, if asked his favourite book of modern poetry, would reply unhesitatingly—The Year of Shame.

FICTION.

Bouvard and Pécuchet. Translated from the French by D. F. Hannigan. (H. S. Nichols.)

WE are glad to have our recollections of Flaubert's rollicking satire freshened by this, its first English translation. Meanwhile, the new reader may be usefully informed that Bouvard and Pécuchet were two middle-aged clerks. Being perfect strangers, they sat down one hot day in the Boulevard Bourdon and swore eternal friendship when they discovered that each had carried out the idea of writing his name in his hat. They were bachelors, both forty-seven, and they both thirsted for knowledge. Then Bouvard came into ten thousand pounds from his uncle, and Pécuchet earned his pension at the Admiralty. They were free. They would shake the dust of Paris from their feet and live as students in the country. Such were the men whom Flaubert started on that endless search after intellectual satisfaction which is the plot of this long-drawn satire on "popular" culture.

Bouvard and Pécuchet took a small estate near Falaise, and threw themselves into agriculture as only amateurs could do. When they met a snail they crushed it with the action and grimaces of giants, and they cut worms in two with their grafting knives so forcibly that the blade sank three inches in the ground. They tried vegetables, a crop of lucerne, cider, cheese; they tried cattle; they took up fruit growing and the making of liqueurs. When the liqueurs failed Pécuchet said: "It is, perhaps, because we do not know chemistry." They precipitated themselves into chemistry. But the "higher atomicity" puzzled them, and the village doctor, Varcorbeil, whom they consulted in their difficulty, switched them on to anatomy. They tired of it, and turned with gusto to astronomy. Successively they turned to archæology, to architecture, to Celticism, to ceramics, goring each subject like bulls. They could not understand earthenware because they knew so little history. "Then they asked Dumouchel: 'What is the best history of France?'"

By the nicest transitions, the most merciless encouragement, Flaubert leads his sleepless puppets round the cycle of knowledge. The fierce humour of the thing accumulates as you read, till it becomes mountainous, till you want to put down the book and decide whether to laugh or weep or protest. Flaubert never got his friends Bouvard and Pécuchet off his hands. Even his synopsis of the uncompleted portion of his work leaves them sitting down with a desperate calm to transcribe and illuminate like the monks.

The book is a burlesque of the unwritten epic of modern popular culture, and he would be a bold man who would say that its satire is spent. But even if that were spent Bouvard and Pécuchet has permanent qualities which justified Mr. Hannigan in his attempt, a very successful one we think, to translate a work so long withheld from English readers.

A Puritan's Wife. By Max Pemberton. (Cassell & Co.)

MR. MAX PEMBERTON is happy in the title of his new book, but unhappy in the stuff of the story he sets himself to tell. A Puritan's Wife seen quaintly printed on the boards of a book is likely to take the fancy of many, but bewilderment will be the portion of those who acquire the book, whether by hire or purchase, when it is opened. A Mr. Hugh Peters (purporting to be the nephew of the chaplain of the Lord-General Cromwell) sets out to tell his story in the first-personal style so much in vogue with the practitioners of the costume-novel. He is in hiding in Epping Forest, at Ambresbury, and we gather that he has been living in Paris, but, unable (for reasons) to endure exile any longer, he has returned, in the fifth year of the Restoration, only to find that a price of five hundred guineas is on his head, on suspicion of his being a French spy. We gather also that when a mere lad he had been married by a tipsy Cavalier parson to a certain Mistress Marjory, who was at the time about the ripe age of fourteen, and is, at the date of the story, at the Court of Charles, and high in his favour. That little person is the Puritan's wife, and is the great metal of attraction to draw Hugh Peters from France into his parlous state in England. Anon comes Sir Nathaniel Goulding to rescue Peters when the King's Guards are on the point of arresting him, and to convey him to the presence of his mistress. Upon Sir Nathaniel the young man fixes a surly suspicion—which is strangely abetted by divers persons for many a page—that he intends to marry her who is the Puritan's wife, while all the while Goulding has no such intention, nor is even in love with the young lady. Then begins a brisk and bustling game of cross-purposes, of arrests and re-arrests, of perils dire, gasping and deadly, of stabs and cries, feats of strength and feats of fight—all to end well when the tale of so many thousand words is told. Mr. Pemberton works manfully to import passion and pathos into his hero's situation; but one must sadly declare he but wastes his effort in trying to make convincing a situation which is incredible all round. Mr. Hugh Peters appears an ill-conditioned, hysterical lout, and Sir Nathaniel Goulding's motives and conduct are incomprehensible. It is a pity that Mr. Pemberton should have wasted his undeniable power and cleverness on so poor and unreal a story, for his vigour and gusto are apparent when he carries us along with his brisk and unceasing movement, all the while that we exclaim against the absurdity or incomprehensibility of the people and actions with which he confronts us.

The Provost Marshal. By the Hon. Frederick Moncrieff. (Blackwood.)

THERE is quite a Stevensonian ring about The Provost Marshal. As we follow the exciting adventures of Robin Maxwell through every kind of peril, the eye is continually on the alert for the better-known name of David Balfour. However, it is a fine picture of a bloody and turbulent time that Mr. Moncrieff gives us, and one that never flags for a moment in its interest. Cranstoun, the Provost Marshal, is a skilful study in early Scottish brutality; the Romish priests are well up to the expected level of intrigue; Barbara Maxwell is a bright spot on a dark canvas; and there is enough of real history to flavour the romance. Even the wild Lord Maxwell, whose desperate doings take up much of the book, is not an impossible study, with his insane belief in his own genius. The secret panel and trap-door business is perhaps brought rather too much into requisition; but as everyone already conceives of old Edinburgh as fashioned like a rat-run in the interests of spies and prisoners, that scarcely matterse. As to the plot, one fails to realise at the end how Robin, the hero, escapes all the hangings, burnings, shootings, and stabbing that threaten him; but he does so, and thenceforth marries the right lady, and succeeds to his estates, both of course by order of the king.

The Rome Express. By Major Arthur Griffiths. (John Milne.)

A BOOK such as Major Griffiths's does not allow much scope for genuine study of character. If the actors have a semblance of life, if they are not so flagrantly inconsistent as to outrage the average reader's sense of probability, it suffices. To criticise The Rome Express as a contribution to serious literature would be, indeed, futile and unfair. Plot, and the way in which it is manipulated, are, however, matters of the first importance. In the present case the author's treatment has less merit than his conception; the story is too long, some of the incidents quite incredible. The central interest is a murder committed in a wagon lit of the Sud Rapide, and the subsequent tracking by the Parisian police of the guilty person. A beautiful Englishwoman, widow of an Italian count; her maid; a chivalrous and impressionable officer in Her Majesty's service; and a mysterious Italian with an evil leer, provide the more or less human elements. The secret of the murder is well kept, but against the method of its final discovery we must protest. Rascals commit many follies, but not that of writing down, red-handed, the story of their crime under the eyes of the police. Major Griffiths's intimate knowledge of the French detective force, and their shrewdly stupid methods, stand him in good stead, for several of his touches in this connexion are excellent.

In the Wilderness. By Adeline Sergeant. (Andrew Melrose.)

SINCERITY and earnestness, valuable qualities though they be, are not of themselves sufficient to ensure literary excellence; yet they give to many a book, otherwise undistinguished, a certain dignity, a certain force. Then, too, some people have such a persuasive way of expressing the truth as they see it; are so unobtrusive, if one may so say, in their didacticism, that we do not revolt against it. Miss Sergeant's plot is of a very ordinary kind. We have read again and again of the frivolous girl who in robbing a friend of her lover prepares a Nemesis for herself; we know the Mrs. Gordon, pained because her daughter is not attractive, and disgusted when, almost broken-hearted, this daughter determines to carry, if possible, a ray of sunshine into the lives of the Whitechapel poor. Indeed, similar stories have been written many times. It is the author's unwavering faith in the potency of unselfish action, her steadfast belief that through high endeavour beauty can be revealed in the commonplace, which give to In the Wilderness its appeal, its quiet charm.

Eric, Prince of Lorlonia; or, The Valley of Wishes. By the Countess of Jersey. (Macmillan & Co.)

Good fairy-tales are not very easy to write: they generally grow ready made. But Lady Jersey knows how to write a fairy-tale of the old kind, with dwarfs and enchanted valleys, and beautiful child-princesses and everything handsome about it; and she has done so in Eric, Prince of Lorlonia. The prince who fills the title-rôle of the story appears in it chiefly as a baby. Like most infant princes in fairy-tales of the right sort, he is an orphan and has envious relatives. How his wicked cousin, Count Vladimir, tried to rob him of his inheritance: how his sister, the Princess Olga, carried him off, with the aid of a most ingenious and attractive monkey, to an island populated by other monkeys under the mild dominion of Duke Ludovic; how the monkeys were (naturally) the descendants of knights and dames that had been transformed by wicked enchantment, and how they were changed back again, with full armour and beautiful clothes thrown in, the story tells. Also, it tells of the Rose City, and the Master of Dreams; and it tells of the Valley of Wishes, where he who first arrived after midnight of New Year's Eve saw all his wishes of the past twelvemonth pass in visible review before him, and could elect which one should be fulfilled on the spot. It is a pretty story, original, and charmingly told. All children will love it, and so will those who, though no longer children, still delight in a fairy-tale.

In Golden Shackles. By "Alien." (Hutchinson & Co.)

THERE is an appalling injustice in the way that novelists sometimes treat their different characters. The hero and heroine are put through many troubles, but in the end they are allowed to find solace in each other's arms if the novel is one with what is called a happy ending. But the other characters in the story have often a terrible time of it all through, and end miserably. Take, for example, Ralph in In Golden Shackles. The author presents him as one with a rough exterior, but with a heart beyond all price. His father is a criminal, and a very wicked old man. Ralph loves a little girl called Bell, who also has a wicked father. But Bell is too good for Ralph; at least, so Ralph thinks. Bell falls in love with Guy, who is good enough for her, and Guy loves her. But Ralph saves Bell's father from going to prison for a felony, and goes there himself instead. Bell thereupon promises to marry him when he comes out. Of course that wouldn't do, so when the trebly unfortunate Ralph comes out of prison he is a helpless paralytic. It is all very well to congratulate Bell and Guy, but we confess our sympathies are with Ralph. Apart from the wilful injustice to which Ralph is subjected, there is much in In Golden Shackles to praise. It is a very readable story, with some stirring scenes and several well-drawn characters. Bell is a very winsome figure, and one of the songs she sings is simply delightful.

A Dangerous Conspirator. By G. Norway. (Jarrold & Sons.)

THE "conspirator" described as "dangerous" appears in these pages to have worked greater havoc with his eyes upon little maidens who thought that he was a hero than upon men of his own size and build. In truth, he is but imperfectly realised, and what there is of him is more ludicrous than repellent. He was shipwrecked when the story opens, somewhere on the Lancashire coast, and Captain Varley gave him hospitality. Captain Varley had two daughters, the eldest of whom, so far as we can gather, was little more than sixteen years of age. Yet she was a sensible little maid, and resented the "eyes" that the handsome stranger made at her. Her younger sister, however, was not so sensible. The Conspirator having swindled his host out of his horse, started for Liverpool to make the acquaintance of Captain Varley's brother. He there laid siege to the heart of Euphemia Varley, with apparently great success. Circumstances compelled him to leave hurriedly, but not before he had persuaded Mr. Varley to join the cause of Bonnie Prince Charlie. Euphemia and her mother went to live with Captain Varley until they should be called upon to join the Court of the Pretender at Edinburgh. History has anticipated that event, and, as far as we can discover, so did the Conspirator, for instead of fighting he appeared at Captain Varley's house and tried to steal the silver. There is no attempt at character drawing, and the construction is very weak, yet the writer has the knack of telling a story.

FROM A READER'S NOTE-BOOK.

THE escape of Ralph Goodwin from Dartmoor, and the discussion arising therefrom, would seem to show that though close on twenty years have passed since the evidence taken before the Penal Servitude Commission of 1878 thrilled all England our prison system is still open to considerable improvement. Those who are interested in the subject may be referred to the Blue-books themselves—Report of the Commission Appointed to Enquire into the Working of the Penal Servitude Acts. 3 vols. (Eyre & Spottiswood. 1879)—and to Mr.

Michael Davitt's Leaves from a Prison Diary. The Hon. Lewis Wingfield was so moved by a perusal of the former, that he tried—after the manner of Charles Reade in Never Too Late to Mend—to rouse public opinion through a novel on the subject. Unfortunately, though his spirit was willing his pen was weak, and In Her Majesty's Keeping attracted little attention. It affords, however, an admittedly accurate picture of the Princeton prison as it was then; and, from all accounts, but little save the admixture of first offenders with "old lags" has been remedied. A far more successful book about contemporary prison life was Five Years' Penal Servitude, by One Who Has Endured It (published in 1877 by Bentley). This ran through eight or nine editions, and had, indeed, not a little to do with the sitting of the 1878 Commission, before which both the author and Michael Davitt gave evidence. Another prison book, in lighter vein, is Eighteen Months' Imprisonment, by D—S—, late captain of the — Regiment, a cheerful soul who suffered imprisonment for what he euphemistically termed "a slip of the pen." Captain S— corrupted warders right and left, and had quite a good time, much after the manner of the convict hero of Major Arthur Griffiths's ingenious detective story Fast and Loose. In the three-volume edition of this novel there occurs an admirably planned prison escape, which, like Ralph Goodwin's, is all but successful. Major Griffiths has, of course, contributed voluminously to prison literature, his well-known Chronicles of Newgate and Chronicles of Millbank, both teeming with criminal adventure.

A curious volume I may mention while on this topic is Susan Willis Fletcher's Twelve Months in an English Prison. Mrs. Fletcher was an American Spiritualist whom conscious innocence supported through her trials, and bolts and bars could not prevent the spirits from flying in to her for a chat of an evening. Her book was published in London by Trübner & Co. in 1884; but few seem to know it. Of latter day works on prison life I consider Scenes from a Silent World (Blackwood, 1889) the most remarkable, and Mr. Horsley's Jottings from Jail (Unwin, 1887) the most useful.

One could name half a dozen others which prison reformers should peruse, but they would not interest the general public.

I attach hereto a library list of readable books treating on prison life from different standpoints.

ACADEMY PORTRAITS.

IX.—THOMAS DE QUINCEY.

THE life of Thomas De Quincey is too well known to need much recounting. It is, indeed, the one thing that most people do know of him, even when they have not read his works. Born at Greenhays, in the Manchester neighbourhood; brought up by a widowed mother with little in her of motherhood; shy, small, sensitive, dwelling in corners, with a passion for shunning notice, for books and the reveries stimulated by books; without the boy's love of games and external activities; the only break in his dreamy existence was the sometime companionship of a school-boy elder brother. That episode in his childhood he has told a little long-windedly, as is the De Quincey fashion; and with curious out-of-the-way humour, as is also the De Quincey fashion. He has told of the imaginary kingdoms ruled by his brother and himself; and how the brother, assuming suzerainty over De Quincey's realm, was continually issuing proclamations which burdened the younger child's heart. Once, for example, the elder brother, having become a convert to the Monbodo doctrine in regard to Primitive Man, announced that the inhabitants of De Quincey's kingdom were still in a state of tail; and ordained that they should sit down, by edict, a certain number of hours per diem, to work off their ancestral appendages. Also has Thomas told of the mill-youths with whom his brother waged constant battle, impressing the little boy as an auxiliary; and how De Quincey, being captured by the adversary, was saved by the womankind of the hostile race, who did, furthermore, kiss him all round; and how, thereupon, his brother issued a bulletin, or order of the day, censuring him in terrible language for submitting to the kisses of the enemy.

The Confessions contain the story of De Quincey's youth: his precocity as a Greek scholar, which led one master to remark of him: "There is a boy who could harangue an Athenian mob better than you or I an English one"; his misery at and flight from school, his subsequent drifting to London, his privations in "stony-hearted" Oxford-street, which he paced at night with the outcast Ann; and there laid the seeds of the digestive disorder which afterwards drove him to opium. His experiences as an opium-eater have become, through his Confessions, one of the best-known chapters in English literary history. The habit, shaken off once, returned on him, never again entirely to be mastered. But he did, after severest struggle, ultimately reduce it within a limited compass, which left free his power of work; and, unlike Coleridge, passed the closing years of his life in reasonable comfort and freedom from anxiety. The contrast was deserved. For the shy little creature displayed in his contest with the obsessing demon of his life a patient tenacity and purpose to which justice has hardly been done. With half as much "grit," Coleridge might have left us a less piteously wasted record. In the midst of this life-and-death struggle, De Quincey worked for his journalistic bread with an industry the results of which are represented in sixteen volumes of prose, while further gleanings have, in these late years, intermittently made their appearance. It is not a record which supports the charge of sluggishness or wasted life. Never, at any period, has it been easy for a man to support his family solely by articles for reviews and magazines. Yet De Quincey did it honourably; and if he was often in straits, it is doubtful whether this should not be set to the account of his financial incompetence.

His life brought him into contact with most of the great littérateurs of his time. "Christopher North" was his only bosom friend; but in his youth he was an intimate of all the "Lake" circle; and, finally, he who had known Wordsworth, Coleridge, Southey, Lamb, Landor, Hazlitt, and at least had glimpse of Shelley, lived to be acquainted with later men like Prof. Masson and others. Not all thought well of him: his talk, like his books, could fret as well as charm; and probably the charge of a certain spitefulness was earned. But, like feminine spite, it could be, and was, co-existent with a kind heart, a gentle and even childlike nature. His children loved him; and though he was a genius, an opium-eater, and married beneath him, he defied all rules by being happy in his marriage.

As a writer, De Quincey has been viewed with the complete partiality dear to the English mind, and hateful to his own. He was nothing if not distinguishing; the Englishman hates distinctions and qualifications. He loved to the Englishman yearns for his hair one and indivisible. The Englishman says, "Black's black—furieusement black; and white's white—furieusement white." De Quincey saw many blacks, many whites, multitudinous grays. Consequently to one he is a master of prose; to another—and that other Carlyle—"wire-drawn." To one he ranks with the Raleighs, the Brownes, the Jeremy Taylors; to another—and that other Mr. Henley—he is "Thomas de Sawdust." And, as usual, both have a measure of rightness. Too often is De Quincey wire-drawn, diffuse, ostentatious in many words of distinctions which might more summarily be put; tantalising, exasperating. Also, if you will suffer him with patience, he is never obvious; a challenger of routine views, a perspicuous, if minute and wordy logician, subtle in balanced appraisal. He was the first to practise that mode of criticism we call "appreciation"—be it a merit or not. Often his rhetorical bravours (as himself called them) are of too insistent, too clamorously artificial, a virtuosity. Also, in a valuable remainder, they are wonderful in vaporous and cloud-lifted imagination, magnificently orchestrated in structure of sentence, superb in range and quality of diction. In a more classified review, he never criticises without casting some novel light, and often sums up the characteristics of his subject in memorably fresh and inclusive sentences. His sketch biographies, marred by characteristic discursiveness, at their best (as in the Bentley or the Shakespeare) are difficult to supersede, eating to the vitals of what they touch. His historical papers are unsystematic, skimming the subject like a sea-mew, and dipping every now and again to bring to the surface some fresh view on this or that point. To re-tell the old has no interest for him; it is the point of controversy, the angle at which he catches a new light, that interests him. But his novel views on insulated aspects of history have sometimes been quietly adopted by succeeding writers. Thus his view of the relations between Cæsar and Pompey, and the attitude of Cicero towards both, is substantially that taken in Dean Merivale's History of the Romans. On his prose fantasies we have already touched. In a certain shadowy vastness of vision we say deliberately that they have more of the spirit of Milton than anything else in the language—though, of course, they have no intention of competing with Milton. They are by themselves. The best of the Confessions; that vision of the starry universe which he greatly improved from Richter; parts (only parts) of The Mail-Coach (which is strained as a whole); portions of The Suspiria; above all, The Three Ladies of Sorrow—these are marvellous examples of a thing which no other writer, unless it be Ruskin, has succeeded in persuading us to be legitimate. Its admirers will always be few; we have no doubt they will always be enthusiastic.

A hair 'twixt south and south-west side;"

His humour should have a word to itself. The famous Murder as One of the Fine Arts, is the only specimen which we need pause upon. Much of that paper is humour out of date; a little childish and obvious. But of the residue let it be said that it was the first example of the topsy-turvydom which we associate with the name of Gilbert. The passage which describes how murder leads at last to procrastination and incivility—"Many a man has dated his ruin from some murder which he thought little of at the time"—might have come out of a Savoy opera. In this, as in other things, De Quincey was an innovator, and, like other innovators, has been eclipsed by his successors. Yet, with all shortcomings, the paper is likely to leave a more durable residuum than much humour which is now of the highest fashion. It is not certain that the slang on which a vast deal of new humour is pivoted will any more amuse posterity than the slang on which De Quincey too often and unluckily relied.

A little, wrinkly, high-foreheaded, dress-as-you-please man; a meandering, inhumanly intellectual man, shy as a hermit-crab, and as given to shifting his lodgings; much-enduring, inconceivable of way, sweet-hearted, fine-natured, small-spited, uncanny as a sprite begotten of libraries; something a bore to many, by reason of talking like a book in coat and breeches—undeniably silver and wonderful talk none the less; master of a great, unequal, seductive, and irritating style; author of sixteen delightful and intolerable volumes, part of which can never die, and much of which can never live:—that is De Quincey.

PARIS LETTER.

(From our French Correspondent.)

M. EUGÈNE D'EICHTHAL has published this week a very remarkable and interesting study of the political life and work of Alexis de Tocqueville. Although this serious book deals sparingly with Tocqueville's private life and character, we manage to get a clear vision here and there of the man, as, for instance, in this self-revealing quotation:

"One may wonder, perhaps, how we endured so long such a way of living, doing much, sleeping little, and never really resting. The only explanation of the phenomenon I can give is this: we willed it, not in half-hearted fashion as, for example, our neighbours' welfare in general, but firmly and resolutely. True, the end was hardly worth the effort, and on our side it was a luxury of strength and tenacity . . . and I only ask one favour of God, that I may be permitted one day to will in the like way something worth the trouble."

Elsewhere, referring to the marriage of religious instinct with broad liberality of thought in Tocqueville, M. d'Eichthal quotes from Tocqueville's biographer:

"In the midst of his greatest troubles, he never ceased to be profoundly Christian; this feeling, which was part of his political faith, touched passion; for he held that there is no liberty possible without morality, and no morality without religion. He firmly believed that the most desirable thing for the good of mankind was the intimate union of religious faith and the love of freedom."

Continuing the theme, M. d'Eichthal writes:

"Though religious by instinct, his enlightened and virile reason would have been disquieted rather than gratified by tendencies to the vague mysticism which are an actual refuge for a certain number of souls frightened by the silence or the reserve of science on questions which disturb their thirst for certainty. He neither liked in religion the policeman that certain conservatives look to find in it, and to which they assign as chief mission the preserving of their earthly goods, nor the rampart of feebleness, against which, without real faith, and for lack of other security, hearts eager for repose seek a stay."

Tocqueville's works, Démocratie en Amérique, Ancien Régime, and La Révolution are excellently analysed by M. d'Eichthal. "To understand the Revolution," Tocqueville said, "I was determined to penetrate to the very heart of the old rule"; and the writer describes his exploration of this defunct system as a marvellous evidence of patience and sagacity. Tocqueville's book is a complete picture of the old state of France subordinate to royal power:

"Other historians may have added features to those gathered by Tocqueville; they may have corrected, attenuated, or rectified those which he has drawn; they have not profoundly modified the image he has traced with the help of accumulated documents, admirably selected and summed up."

Commenting on Tocqueville's concise opinion of the Press, "the empire of journalism must increase with the spread of equality among men," M. d'Eichthal writes a very just and acute page on the advantages and disadvantages of modern freedom of the Press:

"Democracy, in multiplying newspapers, in allowing them to write everything, has not disarmed them nor diminished their venom. The Press has remained that extraordinary organisation so strangely mitigated in good and evil, that without it liberty and even society could not exist, and with it social order can hardly be maintained."

Among the personal remarks of Tocqueville's that please is: "I have a natural leaning to adventure, and a little dash of peril always seems to me the best seasoning one can give to any act of life." And his portrait of Napoleon III., whom M. d'Eichthal describes as a "figure ténébreuse," is deservedly immortal. What could be better than the lines that paint the man's dead glance?

"His dissimulation, which was profound, as that of a man who has spent his life in plotting, was singularly assisted by the immovability of his features and the insignificance of his glance; for his eyes were dull and opaque like those thick glasses destined to light ship cabins, which let the light pass, but through which one can see nothing."

And touching on the incoherence of the Prince's dreamy and chimerical mind, he adds:

"When forced to leave these vague and vast regions (the Napoleonic legend) to limit his mind to business, he often showed himself capable of accuracy, sometimes of subtlety and breadth, and even a certain depth, but never sure—always ready to place a wild idea beside a just one."

M. d'Eichthal's study is an able and important contribution to political literature, written in a sober and masterly style, austere in its lack of enthusiasm, coldly impartial.

To it are added fragments of conversations between Tocqueville and Nassau.

The publisher, M. Lemerre, has brought out an extremely handsome volume gathered from the works of M. Alphonse Daudet, called Les Mères. It comes appropriately at the season of étrennes, for it is illustrated, and is quite an édition de luxe. All the tender and devoted mothers that figure in M. Daudet's long list of books here re-enact their maternal rôle disconnected from their wider setting. M. Gustave Toudouze is responsible for the selection. The single figure, he declares, that dominates all others in M. Daudet's books, by its continuity, its persistence, its luminous smile and ineffable tenderness, is that of the mother. The word mother—"cry of the cradle, cry of the grave"—vibrates in poignant tones throughout these novels, and no French writer has ever glorified maternity with a more ardent and admiring pen than Alphonse Daudet. The books that contribute these figures of eternal sacrifice and devotion, of abnegation and unquenchable love, are The Nabab in Mama Jansoulet, La Lutte pour la Vie in Madame Astier, Le petit Chose in the brother whom Daudet calls "Ma mère Jacques," Fromont jeune et Risler aîné in Madame Delobelle, La petite Paroisse, Les Rois en Exile, Numa Roumestan, Jack, L'Évangéliste (surely the most tragic picture of maternal sorrow and despair), and Rosa et Ninette. The volume makes a very acceptable gift for the season, charmingly illustrated by Myrbach.

FRENCH BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Alexis de Tocqueville. Étude par Eugène d'Eichthal.
Les Mères. Alphonse Daudet.

NEW YORK LETTER.

(From our American Correspondent.)

ONE of the most attractive and satisfactory American books of the year to the lover of stirring and haunting songs is More Songs from Vagabondia, by Bliss Carman and Richard Hovey. Of course this vagabond life of the poets is purely idealisation, and not at all like that of the typical American tramp. The poets roam at large through the domain of Canada and the adjoining states of Maine and Massachusetts, with care for neither scrip nor raiment, and the fillip they give the town reader is something that must be experienced to be appreciated. The book is the companion volume of Songs from Vagabondia, which made a great success as poetry goes a year ago. It is published by Copeland & Day, of Boston.

THE literature of children, for children, and their elders who enjoy the ways and thoughts of children, seems to be growing apace here, to keep up with the activity in this field, which has become a feature of contemporary English literary production. The books of William Canton, Mrs. Meynell, and Kenneth Grahame seem to have suddenly fired American writers to rake up their own childish reminiscences. So we have a little army of golden boys and girls trooping down the highway of literature—airy, fairy, fantastic children that few of us have ever known in life. Among the new books appealing to this hunger of parents for some parallel to their own idealisations are In Childhood's Country, by Mrs. Louise Chandler Moulton, and A Boy's Book of Rhymes, by Clinton Scollard; others, devoted to the ideal characteristics of apotheosised gamins from the slums of New York and Chicago, are Artie and Checkers. This taste seems to grow, but I would like to know what the children make of this literature. They mostly take their real playmates in an uncompromisingly realistic fashion, and, moreover, I have a suspicion that these purely ideal children are the companions of the childless rather than of parents with responsibilities.

MRS. LOUISE CHANDLER MOULTON's latest book, In Childhood's Country, divides honours with another American woman, though in another field of art—Miss Ethel Reed, the most successful woman poster artist, who has contributed several excellent illustrations to it. Miss Reed is adapting the new art to the New Child. These children's books strike one as too beautiful and elaborate for the nursery; but, then, the literature in them is decidedly for immature minds. Another book by the same author is Lazy Tours in Spain and Elsewhere. Messrs. Roberts Bros. are the publishers. These will be popular, not only because Mrs. Moulton is an established favourite of yesterday and still holds her own to-day, but the Spanish-Cuban war brings that country prominently before our notice, and awakens a fresh interest in every phase of life there.

MR. HAMILTON WRIGHT MABIE's new book of essays on Books and Culture is a vital piece of work. Mr. Mabie is a man of wide reading and culture, and this book is especially a call to the younger generation to reinstate seriousness in life and literature here. It is an inspiration to our writers to hold fast to the real ideals of literature. It is a book that belongs to a category now very limited in American, perhaps also in English, letters. Fiction has supplanted all serious work. The style of these essays is somewhat Emersonian in their directness of expression and simplicity. But they do not aim at Emerson's intense crystallisation. Mr. Mabie writes in a logical flow to seduce rather than to surprise. At this time and in this country there is so much reading, and proportionately so little real culture, that a book like this should do much to whet a new appetite for the rarer curiosities of the best. The feeling for literature, as Mr. Mabie points out, is a rarer possession than is commonly supposed. But this book has a note of encouragement for the receptive mind, susceptible of culture; and it will doubtless wield considerable influence in the growing public beginning to be interested in literature as literature. The trouble in this country is that the inordinate greed for entertaining fiction, while not perhaps actually hurtful to the average and superficial reader, mars and distracts many minds worthy of a better curiosity. The writer's opinion is that a mild glimpse of the literary millennial dawn in America will come when we take to discouraging the vast bulk of the worst English fiction, and find some latitude for American writers of serious aims and purpose in poetry, criticism, and the essay. This is not looking toward establishing any form of protection against the masters of literature in the mother country. But we want some lee-way for an individual intellectual life. At present we are smothered by the banal newspapers, and intellectual bankruptcy is completed by a plague of unreal English mediocrities, dealing in melodramatic romance. America has resources for something better, but needs an atmosphere of her own.

ANOTHER historical romance is by Prof. Charles G. D. Roberts, called The Forge in the Forest, published by the same firm. Mr. Roberts is a Canadian, a native of New Brunswick. But so far as literary work is concerned, Canadian writers are, to all intents and purposes, Americans—America being their market. Many writers may and do starve in garrets here; but no one has ever heard even of a "Grub-street" in the beautiful, bracing climate to the north of us.

THE New York "Bodley Head" is in the centre of a great unpicturesque thoroughfare, in an ordinary, commercial building, where imagination, illusions, and fancy are not. The very name seems out of place—in plain, methodical letters on the modern plate-glass windows. It is a place for the multitudes to pass by with an uncomprehending glance, rather than a refuge for the idealist from the clatter of the city. Here is no picturesque, no historical background to feed the imagination; no old-fashioned quaint sign to make the intellectual wanderer pause and reflect; no delightful confusion of rare and precious literary stock, tantalisingly disarrayed to tempt the artistic eye. There is not even the picturesque ugliness which saves all its beauty for the evening lights and shadows, like certain grimy and squalid quarters of the city under gas light, or sooty railroad neighbourhoods, which seen by moonlight suggest eternal mystery and beauty—it is sheer common-sense commerce. Mr. John Lane should have imported into this city an old shop from London, with an iron bracket lamp and brass knocker, and all New York would have been piqued to buy books. We hunger for a bit of cobwebby antiquity. To meet the desire for a refuge from the bustle of the city, there is an æsthetic movement among the saloon keepers to fit up cellars and large old rooms as old German baronial banquet halls. Mr. Lane should have given us a typical old English book shop, or he could have found some quaint and delightful quarters in old Boston.

CORRESPONDENCE.

EXCALIBUR.

Cambridge, Jan. 4.

Excalibur was the name of Arthur's sword; I do not remember to have met with an explanation of the name.

In perusing a MS. of the fourteenth century, I lately came across the expression "cultellum ex calibe," meaning "a steel knife."

It occurs to me as probable that the name Excalibur was simply suggested by this medieval phrase "ex calibe," and means neither more nor less than "made of steel."

Of course calibe is another spelling of chalybe, the ablative of chalybs, which is mere Greek. At a time when Greek was little known, calibe was a mysterious-looking vocable, very suitable for romantic use.

WALTER W. SKEAT.

THE MEDIEVAL JEW AND RITUAL MURDER.

Paris, Jan. 4.

In reference to the letter signed "Thomas Delta," I should advise your correspondent to read Hermann Strack, Der Blutbergglaube (Munich, 1892, 4th ed.). He would easily learn therein that Pliny twice mentions human blood as a remedy against epilepsy and soreness of the throat (Nat. Hist. xxviii. 1, 2 and 4, 10). In the second passage, Pliny refers to Orpheus and Archelaos as authorities; these worthies were no more of Jews than old Pliny himself. Salustius and Dio Cassius tell us that Catiline and his friends drank wine mixed with human blood. Antiquity and the Middle Ages are full of superstitions involving the use of human blood; Judaism alone has always been free from them, because the oldest Jewish law even forbids to drink the blood of animals. Hebrew doctors have gone so far as to discuss if a man commits a sin when, having a slight wound on his lip, he eats bread soiled by a drop of his own blood. The origin of the whole legend about the ritual murder ascribed to the Jews is to be found in a passage of Tertullianus, where he refutes the calumnies of certain pagans who attributed that atrocious custom to the early Christians. When Christianity conquered the world the calumny remained, but was directed against the Jews alone. For further details I refer your readers to Strack's work, and also, if I may be allowed to do so, to an article contributed by myself to the Revue des Études Juives (1892, pp. 161-180).

SALOMON REINACH.

CONTRIBUTORS TO THE Germ.

British Museum, Jan. 4.

The statement in the ACADEMY of January 2, that Coventry Patmore and William Morris contributed to the Germ, is erroneous as regards the latter, who was only just sixteen when the Germ ceased to exist. It is worthy of record, however, that Patmore contributed to the Saturday Review of December 26, 1857, an article entitled "Walls and Wall Painting at Oxford," on the paintings executed by Morris and his associates in the hall of the Oxford Union, which is, perhaps, the best account extant of those vanished works.

R. GARNETT.

PETERBOROUGH CATHEDRAL.

Dulwich: Jan. 5.

Considering that "the point" (as to the methods by which the West Front of Peterborough Cathedral is to be made secure) "is inevitably a practical one"—I quote the ACADEMY of last week—it seems a pity that it should not be treated with more exactness as a practical matter. The Dean and Chapter are, no doubt, in a position to have their own way to the uttermost; but as the public is being invited to subscribe the money, which shows no indecent haste in coming in, one fancies that nothing could be lost if the societies which have intervened, and not empty-handed, in the name of the public were permitted to make the further examination of the fabric which they desire, and which the Dean and Chapter think superfluous. Such an examination is the less objectionable, because no time would be lost by it: it could be made while the hat is going round. And it would unquestionably help on the subscription list!

Peterborough Cathedral is too important a matter to be risked on a punctilio. If the Dean and Chapter are right—very likely they are—they have everything to gain by a full investigation—and it is only an investigation that is asked for. Their present attitude of “You find the money, we’ll prescribe how it shall be spent,” is just the one which—and not in this matter alone—the present rulers of the Church of England are but too ready to adopt, and which those who most ardently love that Church as an institution, whatever they may think of it as an establishment, most strongly deprecate. Is it not better that the Peterborough authorities should choose to err, if at all, on the side of liberality?

NOTES AND NEWS.

MR. ARCHER'S paper on “The Blight on the Drama” has aroused controversy, and the controversy has produced an entertaining letter from Mr. Zangwill. “The Blight on the Drama” may interest many readers, but Mr. Zangwill on the Blight will interest more, especially as it contains the inner history of his career as a dramatist. In disproof of Mr. Louis N. Parker's remark that Mr. Zangwill was an “outcast novelist who had knocked vainly at the stage door,” Mr. Zangwill points to his own theatrical record. In collaboration he wrote “The Great Demonstration,” and, without assistance, “Six Persons,” a curtain-raiser; and “Aladdin at Sea,” a burlesque. “Six Persons” survived three pièces de résistance, and now forms part of Mr. Hare's repertory in America, and “Aladdin at Sea” ran for months in provincial towns. “Six Persons” was written in a day and a half, and “Aladdin at Sea” in a day; and, says Mr. Zangwill, “if I took them seriously I should be ashamed of them.”

MR. ZANGWILL continues, with reference to Mr. Barrie's Professor's Love Story, that the dramatist “makes no secret of the fact that the play only occupied three weeks of his time, while a novel of his demands the labour and concentrated thought of years. It is ridiculous to compare the plays of the moment with the novels in the publishers' lists. I speak, mark you,” Mr. Zangwill adds, “not of plays as they should be, but of plays good enough to please the British public.” This seems to indicate that if the novelists were wise they would say nothing critical but take full advantage of the blight. By writing a successful play in three weeks they may make enough money to enable them to give three years to a good novel.

It might here be stated that another and more weighty critic of the drama than Mr.

Zangwill has just completed a play on which we may safely suppose no blight rests. This is “The Devil's Disciple,” the new romantic play by Mr. Bernard Shaw. Mr. Shaw has made use of the American War of Independence as a background. Meanwhile there are in existence no fewer than two plays by Mr. Shaw still to be performed in London.

To return for a moment to the drama, a number of Frenchmen of eminence have been composing wishes for the New Year at the instigation of the European correspondent of the New York World. M. Sardou's is as follows, and seems to have some reference to the blight as he sees it: “May the year 1897 bring sunshine to dramatic art, and dissipate the Norwegian mists which obscure and sadden it. That is the wish of a Frenchman, Latin to the heart, convinced that in all the arts, as well as in nature, blight does not come from the North, but from the South.”

M. BENJAMIN CONSTANT sent no wish, but this handful of the thoughts of a painter: “Art regulates genius.—Art without genius makes a pedant, and genius without art makes a madman!—He who criticises appears always to be a greater connoisseur than he who admires.—He who begins as a master frequently ends as a pupil.—Apropos of literary painting, nothing is less literary than the ‘Square Salon’ at the Louvre.—One reaches character more easily by drawing than by colour.—Drawing may dispense with colour, colour cannot dispense with drawing.—Nature is invincible!”

AMONG the allurements of the modern exhibition is the telephone wire which unites the visitor at Earl's Court and the actors in London. For sixpence one may hear fragments of half the plays now proceeding, and become possessed of the right of criticising each dramatist. In Buda Pesth they have gone farther. There, for forty-five francs a year, one may become a subscriber to the telephonic newspaper. The telephonic newspaper differs from others only in communicating its news by word of mouth along the wire instead of in print. The subscribers' houses are connected by wire with the office of the paper. Every day, beginning at nine o'clock, the contents are read aloud in the office while thousands of ears are glued to the other ends. The reading goes on at intervals till night. Already the Telefon Hirmondo, as it is called, has 6,000 subscribers and 550 kilometres of wire.

A WRITER in the Daily News tells a story of Matthew Arnold to the effect that once when examining a class in geography, on a cold day, he seized the poker to stir the fire, and after doing so held it aloft and asked if any child could tell him where it was manufactured. There was a long silence, broken by the schoolmistress, who remarked nervously that such information was not mentioned in Cornwell's Geography. “No,” said Arnold, “Cornwell's an ass.” Whether or not the story is true, and whether or not Cornwell is an ass, we cannot say; but there is no doubt that English educationalists do contrive not to teach a vast number of simple things that are both useful and interesting.

ONCE again the friends of rational spelling, at whose head are Prof. Max Müller and Sir Isaac (or as he spells it, Eizak) Pitman, are meditating a memorial to the Education Department. In 1879 they made their last appeal, that in future, by the laws of the country, we should manage our orthography more after the style of Artemus Ward than Matthew Arnold, but the Education Department declined to interfere. The spelling reformers are now preparing another attack, and persons of importance are being asked by them to sign a document addressed to the President and Vice-President of the Education Department, testifying that “great obstruction to education is caused by the irregularity of English spelling,” and asking for a practical remedy. This document is not, however, spelled after the reformer's own private epistolary manner, but in the barbarous and retrograde style common to English writers of the past two and a half centuries. Earlier than that, it is true, the spelling was more reformed; indeed, the extremely reformed orthography of Chaucer is still food for Transatlantic humorists.

THIS is the way the 36,000 members of the National Union of Teachers would like their countrymen to spell (the passage is from a letter by Benjamin Franklin in reply to the objection that the phonetic spelling of words means the loss of etymology): “Wurdz in the cōrs ov teim, chainj ther meeningz, az wel az ther speling and pronunsiaschon; and we doo not look tu etimolojy for ther prezent meeningz. If I shud caul a boy a Naiv and a Vilain, he wud hardly be satisfeid with my teling him, that wun ov the wurdz orijinally signifeid only a lad or a servant, and the uthar an under plowman, or the inhabitant ov a vilej. It iz from prezent eusej (usage) only, the meening ov wurdz iz tu be determind.” In Artemus Ward and Josh Billings this kind of thing is droll and welcome. In serious writers it is only distressing.

A LETTER from Mr. Mosher, of Portland, Maine, revives our interest in the dispute between that gentleman and Mr. Lang as to the propriety of reprinting, against the author's wishes, the Ballads and Lyrics of Old France. Mr. Mosher, it will be remembered, announced his intention of doing so. Mr. Lang objected. Mr. Mosher carried out his threat. Mr. Lang warned the American public against the book, and washed his hands of the affair. It does not seem to us that Mr. Mosher is in a defensible position; for if an author does not want his early work to be again issued, surely his wish should be respected. Mr. Mosher's excuse is that the public wanted the poems; but that, strictly, is Mr. Lang's affair. In the absence of a copyright law such difficulties must arise again and again. The only thing we can say for Mr. Mosher is that he publishes exquisitely.

AMONG papers that are not generally known is The Prisons' Service Review, which is an authoritative record of what goes forward in England's jails, and not that famous journal which a certain body of convicts maintained, with the motto "The gods help those who help themselves." In the current number, however, some idea of the literary convict may be gained from a collection of "muroscripts" or writings copied from the walls of the cells; the humorous convict, that is, for the despairing misanthropic critic of society is not here represented. The following summary of the free life and the life of fetters is as laconic as anything in literature:

"In, Thin; Out, Stout."

And here is another specimen (a screw being a gaoler):

"Although the 'screws'
Call me 'K 9,'
They take great care
I get no w(h)ine."

If, as Dr. Johnson said, a man who will make a pun will pick a pocket, we know why this poet was "in."

C. K. S., writing in the Illustrated London News, gives his readers some of the inner history of Margaret Ogilvy. "It is interesting," he says, "to identify the characters in this beautiful book apart from Mr. Barrie's own family circle. The friend who is described as an African explorer was the late Joseph Thomson. The English provincial newspaper which knew Mr. Barrie as a sub-editor was the Nottingham Journal. Mr. Barrie's first article in London was published by Mr. Stead in the Pall Mall Gazette, but the 'editor-man' who published An Auld Licht Community, and thus laid the foundation of Mr. Barrie's fortunes as a painter of Scottish home-life, was Mr. Frederick Greenwood. That first sketch appeared in the St. James's Gazette November 17, 1884. The other editor depicted by Mr. Barrie in Margaret Ogilvy as having had 'as large a part in making me a writer of books as the other in determining what the books should be about,' was Dr. Robertson Nicoll, who admired something by Mr. Barrie in the Edinburgh Evening Dispatch, and on the strength of it asked him to write for the British Weekly. Mr. Barrie wrote much for Dr. Nicoll under the signature of 'Gavin Ogilvy,' and it was Dr. Nicoll who first made him known by name to the public, as it was Mr. Greenwood who first made him known by work. The delightful story of joining a club is based upon Mr. Barrie's election to the Garrick, for which he was proposed by Lord Rosebery and seconded by Mr. Greenwood."

THE new interest in Byron may need some explanation, but there can be no doubt of its existence. To the labours of Lord Lovelace and Mr. W. E. Henley must now be added those of Mr. Clement K. Shorter, who, having given us the fruits of his study of the Brontës, is preparing a book on Lord Byron. The plan of Mr. Shorter's work is such that it will not clash with the work of other editors. Mr. Shorter will, we understand, attempt a careful character sketch of Byron with special reference to the influence of heredity on his life. We shall hear much also of the Celtic strain in his blood, and of the Scottish surroundings of his childhood. Such a treatment of Byron should prove valuable, and in Mr. Shorter's hands it is likely to be so.

THE few fortunate persons who possess Bishop Creighton's illustrated monograph on Queen Elizabeth and Dr. Skelton's Mary Stuart, published by Messrs. Bousod Valadon & Co., will know what to expect from the announcement that the third volume of the series is to be called Queen Victoria. The letterpress will be supplied by Mr. Richard R. Holmes, the Royal Librarian, who has the assistance of Her Majesty in his work, and the illustrations will be chosen with as much care and reproduced as delicately as those in the preceding volumes. It is safe to say that this present year of celebration is not likely to produce any more worthy souvenir.

THE Clarendon Press will publish shortly the Hebrew original of ten chapters of Ecclesiasticus (xxxix. 15—xliv. 11) lately discovered in the East. It was generally supposed that St. Jerome was the last scholar who saw or possessed it, until recently a Hebrew treatise, written by Saadiah Gaon (about 920 A.D.), was found, in which the author quotes several sentences in Hebrew from Ecclesiasticus. Thus the book was still extant at that time in Bagdad, where Saadiah lived. No further trace of the Hebrew text was discovered until about June, 1896, when a MS. leaf, brought to England by Mrs. Lewis, of Cambridge, was recognised as a portion of the long-lost original of Ecclesiasticus. The credit of this discovery belongs to Mr. S. Schechter, Reader in Talmudic in the University of Cambridge. Almost simultaneously nine leaves of the same MS., brought likewise from the East, were identified in the Bodleian Library.

THE Cambridge leaf was published by Mr. Schechter, with an English translation and short commentary, in the Expositor for July, 1896. The Clarendon Press is now issuing a critical edition of all ten leaves, consisting of the Hebrew original, accompanied by an English translation and the Greek, Syriac, and Old Latin versions, followed by a complete glossary of new forms found in the Hebrew text, and of words used in new senses. A full list is added of the proverbs of Jesus, son of Sirach, genuine and spurious, found in Talmudic and Rabbinic literature, arranged according to the order of the Greek version. The preface gives full literary particulars respecting the book. One main result of the new text is that it proves Sirach to have written classical Hebrew (with the exception of a few New-Hebrew words). Two facsimile pages, the first and last of the Oxford fragment, are appended, showing marginal notes of various readings, somewhat resembling the Massora to the Old Testament.

The Lives of Twelve Bad Women will be published very shortly by Mr. Fisher Unwin. Among the bad women will be found Frances Howard, Countess of Somerset; Barbara Villiers; Alice Ferrers, the favourite of Edward the Third; Mary Bate-man, the Yorkshire witch; and Mrs. Brownrigg.

MESSRS. LONGMANS will publish in January a small volume of letters from Constantinople by Mrs. Max Müller. They were written three years ago, and Mrs. Max Müller saw chiefly the bright side of Turkish life. Her letters, therefore, represent the country as a place not less worthy to be visited than Rome or Venice. A few letters from Prof. Max Müller are added, and the little volume is beautifully illustrated by twelve views of Constantinople and the neighbourhood.

MESSRS. LONGMANS & Co. will publish in January a new work in two volumes, by the Right Hon. Prof. F. Max Müller. Its title is Contributions to the Science of Mythology, and it is intended to fill the gap between his Science of Language and the Science of Religion. The work of his life, which he had planned and traced out long ago, is thus carried through and finished.

THE February issue of Messrs. J. M. Dent & Co.'s "Temple Classics," under the general editorship of Mr. Israel Gollancz, will contain the first volume of a new edition of Florio's Montaigne, which is to be completed in six volumes during this year. Mr. A. Rainey Waller is the editor, and he contributes a glossary and brief notes to each volume, in addition to supervising the text.

MR. HENRY FROWDE, Oxford University Press Warehouse, will publish almost immediately Virgil's Eclogues, done into English hexameters by the Right Hon. Sir George Osborne Morgan, Bart., Q.C., M.P. for East Denbighshire. Many metrical translations of Virgil have appeared, but it seemed possible to Sir George that some of the charm inspired by what Tennyson called "the stateliest measure ever moulded by the lips of man" might be preserved if the author's metre were adopted. The translation is dedicated to Mr. Gladstone, who throughout his long and illustrious life has known how to lighten the cares of a statesman by the recreations of a scholar.

MESSRS. HUTCHINSON & Co. have in the Press for immediate publication a new novel by Adeline Sergeant, to be called The Idol Maker. Dr. S. R. Keightley, who has already published through Messrs. Hutchinson & Co. two historical romances under the titles of The Crimson Sign and The Cavaliers, has just completed a third volume, which will be published by the same firm, under the title of The Last Recruit of Clara's.

ART.

LORD LEIGHTON'S COLLECTED WORKS.

ARTIFICIAL light, albeit at its best in electricity, is not favourable to the rather limited tones of Lord Leighton's colour. This was disappointing, during the recent dark days, to those who had promised themselves that kind of general revision of Lord Leighton's work as a colourist to which a large gathering of pictures is favourable. The decorative quality of colour is hardly to be gauged at all in detail, and Lord Leighton's work, companion to architecture, should accompany, set off, surround, and decorate itself when there are not blond marble and new gold to make for his pictures avenues, corridors, and courts. If it is artificial, the artifice is not further removed from nature than is the gold refined or the marble sleeked. By artificial light the fairness looked a little pallid. One went in search of remembered dark-blue seas, and the blues and whites of heroic skies, to find that even these looked no more profound than the paint that made them might look on the palette; that is, the vibration which seemed the subsidence of the waves of natural impression seemed to have become all but imperceptible. Nevertheless it must be there, in the "Daphnephoria" and the "Hesperides"—a communication with the climate and the distances of what Hotspur calls the "live air."

LORD LEIGHTON'S artificiality is so much a matter of surface, and therefore so manifest, that a careless appreciation fails to perceive the intent submission with which he obeyed nature in that part of his art which was the chief part to him—design. What have we left to measure with if we play false with the human figure, and cheaply help ourselves to dignity and beauty with a measuring-rod that we have tampered with? When the "Eve" at the New Gallery holds aloft a little head some twelfth part of her stature in size, we are apt to wonder why her painter should not—ill-content with the human rule—build a figure of fifteen heads or twenty; also why he is not thankful enough that the normal height of a human woman is not of five heads; and what he would have done if it had been so. Lord Leighton consistently seeks the heroic proportion by the inflection and not the infraction of the laws of the growth of the body. He was as sure as were the Greeks that no figure is tall that is not human. Sometimes, as in "Flaming June," he has pushed the limit rather far, but even there he has not broken through.

NOWHERE does he any violence to nature, which, after all, has life and may be killed by arbitrary dealing; what a dissatisfied criticism finds so persistently in his work is probably that he too much controls her. That control is evident in the actions resolved upon for the very sake of their simplicity—for example, the attitude of the girlish figures to the right of the composition of "The Captive Andromache." This control of his has in its grasp the familiarities and accidents of employment and posture, and looks even more deliberate than when it orders the enthroned graces of a "Tragic Poetess" or a "Spirit of the Summit." The girls are drawing water in a row; one with her robes tucked close about her knees, one with her arm propped against the face of the wall, are, as it were, condemned and compelled to be exquisitely natural. Their naturalness, including a touch of awkward village character, as village character might be in Argos, has been devised in the deliberation of the careful processes of the studio. Nothing is neglected or forgotten—not even impulse, carelessness, and a wild spirit.

No such paradox, however, is true of two or three figures of little girls, in which Lord Leighton has not lost the first simplicity. They seem unlike the rest; whether because the painter moderated his preparations, and omitted the preliminary nude study, or dispensed himself from modelling the figure, and clothing it in little draperies dipped in water so that the folds might be under complete management; or whether his delight in the real action of a child compelled him to take possession of it exactly as it was—alive—for some other intelligible reason, these little girls are not only exquisite but fresh, in design, character, and posture. One of them is "Study," another the Cleoboulina in "Cleoboulus instructing his Daughter Cleoboulina," another the child in the "Music Lesson," and yet another, the lovely little figure of the young one in "The Sister's Kiss." There were but few little girls in any of the schools of painting before the days of Sir Joshua Reynolds, unless when Infantas and Meninas stood to be painted by Velazquez, or—more rarely—when Titian painted a little Virgin in an oval halo, going alone up the steps to dedicate herself in the Temple. And Lord Leighton perceived a character of their beauty which neither of those two masters thought about. He, like Sir Joshua, had a tenderness for the lowly character of a figure of eight years old, and for the careless curves of its natural softness; as though he knew that a character so simple and so unconscious—nay, so easily fatigued and distracted—must not be too much delayed. He has made it live, in the liberty wherewith he would not entrust man or woman, in that perfectly beautiful group just mentioned—"The Sister's Kiss." The action of head, figure, and little hands, as the child bends to her elder sister's upturned head, are purely childlike.

THE early pictures—with the Cimabue procession itself—have not been continuously secluded since they were first exhibited and bought. To see them again is to renew the impression of contrast between Lord Leighton's mediæval time and his later renaissance. He was for some years devoted to the "picturesque," in which his own extreme intelligence preserved him from the ordinary neglect of individuality into which a costume painter lapsed at that time.

Every figure in the great "Procession" is a distinct Florentine, and not a generalised person "combined" from the very beginning of English art in Italy. If the character is not very strong, it is everywhere evident that the painter of four-and-twenty worked for that end, and that if he had painted costume to the last, he would have done so with a sense of place and person and a vigilant use of his eyes. For, although his method implied a constant use (it may well be an abuse) of the studio, it was from la vie surprise that he took the initial suggestion and aspect, control it later as he might. And this was so even when, in after years, he would not permit the aspect of life to stand in his finished picture until its impulse was frozen and still after many studies. The "Procession" is brilliant in colour, and its design has all the promise of the perfect elegance of the future.

"DANTE AT VERONA" is not in the collection; nor is the beautiful "Odalisque," but there are other equally pure and refined studies of white—white illuminated and white translucent, opaque, transparent, or steeped in delicate shadows; but always cool, never gilded with the gold of the Venetians or of Sir Joshua Reynolds. Nor is the "Phryne" here, the most conspicuous nude subject being the "Venus" of 1867, a deliberate and very graceful figure of which one foot helps the other to slip off a sandal. The painter has made his "Venus" to stoop and prop her hand on her knee with an action simple, familiar, and human to describe, but very academic as Lord Leighton has ordered it. The fastidious grace that was his aim certainly rewards him. Neither in this lovely figure nor elsewhere does it become trivial. To reproach his kind of beauty with "prettiness" is entirely to misapprehend the severity, the scholarship, and the remoteness from anything ordinary or silly which set a seal upon the merest nymph he ever drew.

"CYMON AND IPHIGENIA" is somewhat marred by the exaggeration of preparation displayed in the principal recumbent figure; nevertheless it remains one of Lord Leighton's great successes. Of the portraits it is not necessary to speak. They are not distinguished—with the one famous exception of the "Richard Burton," extraordinary for the character, solidity, and power of understanding and painting alike, and for the thought and fire of the brown eye.

THE landscapes and landscape studies in the last room are exceedingly beautiful. They are luminous, simple, local, spirited, brilliant, and full of "live air." Especially charming are one or two of Broussa or other passages of the cultivated lands of Asia Minor, where the delicate mists of light are interrupted by the dark shapes of single cypresses and pines. This effect of emphasis, unaltered by distance, gives a most peculiar touch to the shining prospects of Italy and the East alike. As the tones and values lessen and diminish in the distance, they are suddenly broken by one great flat pine, almost as black and emphatic in the furthest plane as is another great flat pine, also solitary, close at hand in the foreground. But lately we were admiring this distinctive effect on the way to Naples, and wondering whether a painter would have the courage to render it. In Lord Leighton's studies it is rendered, and is most beautiful.

A. M.

DRAMA.

IT is a proof of the genuinely dramatic quality of "Black Ey'd Susan" that while one enjoys and laughs at the luxuriance of the dialogue, its wealth of nautical metaphor, its grandiloquent and anachronistic statements of virtue and villainy, one is yet interested in the progress of the story, cheered by the failure of Hatchett's plot and William's denunciation of Doggrass's hardness of heart, and positively delighted that William and Susan should be happy ever after. That is to say, one is so delighted if one happens to be a person of unsophisticated sentimentality, and happily most of us are that. Certainly as a play, "Black Ey'd Susan" is an excellent piece of work. William's return is a well contrived effect, and so is the trial scene, with William's heartrending sense of discipline, and his pathetic-comic witnesses—the honest fellows! I do not think so much of the fight with Captain Crosstree, because even when you are rescuing innocence in distress you could hardly fail to recognise your own captain (there is no mention of William being short-sighted), or, at least, the captain would have made some remark on this subject—"Hold, William! Lo, I am your superior officer," or words to that effect. The execution scene is discounted by the certainty of the reprieve. The characters are well balanced—the mean and saturnine Doggrass by the generous-minded and robustly humorous Gnatbrain, the black-ey'd but lugubrious Susan by the light-hearted Dolly Mayflower, the manly and virtuous William by his manly but vicious captain. The play has, of course, the irrelevant interest of old manners in addition; I do not suppose that Douglas Jerrold drew a minutely realistic picture of the contemporary sailor, but he does represent the popular idea of the British tar of the period, his amatory and bibulous disposition—quite innocent, though, except in the case of the captain—his great heart, and his unintelligible language.

THE play was thoroughly well done at the Adelphi. The scenery was pretty and clever, the dresses were delightful—especially the sailors', and most especially Captain Crosstree's coat—and the choruses and crowds generally were excellently managed. The acting was good—with a swing to it, and a proper and cheerful enjoyment of the full-bodied dialogue. Mr. William Terriss's William was one of the best things he has done. His strenuousness, and — possibly — his occasional staginess, which have sometimes a little irritated one, were here quite in the right vein. His rollicking was unforced, and his emotion was "manly, sir, manly," as F. B. used to say. His hornpipe was a thing of joy, and his self-respecting humility in the trial scene was admirable acting. I did not care so much for his pathos in the scene of parting with his wife, but that is not a good part of the play. Miss Millward was an artistic Susan, never straining the lugubrious note, but perhaps not gay enough in the one opportunity of gaiety. Her scene with Captain Crosstree was handicapped by the absurdity of her having to run round the stage in her efforts to escape while there was an open street in front of her, but I thought her innocence was pretty to see. My impression was that Mr. Harry Nicholls gagged his part, and that he should not have done, but he made some way against the difficulties of out-worn humour. Miss Vane Featherston was a lively coquette as Dolly. Mr. Fulton's Crosstree was sufficient; he faced the "I must and shall possess her" speech quite nobly. Mr. Beveridge's Doggrass was full of spite and comic unscrupulousness, and Mr. Oscar Adye's Hatchett was not bad. I do not know who sung the "Sweet William" song, but he had a good manner of singing.

By the way, I wish somebody would revive the burlesque. The tune of "Pretty Se-usan, don't say No" is one of my earliest recollections, and I should like to hear "Captain Crosstree is my name." Of course a burlesque of a play, the dialogue of which has come in the course of time to burlesque itself, is in a way a superfluity, but there must be people enough enjoying the revival at the Adelphi to make the other revival worth somebody's while, and the thing would have a real interest.

MESSRS. T. AND J. MADDISON MORTON'S "All that Glitters is not Gold," which was played before "Black Ey'd Susan," seemed to me to be a remarkably bad play. I sincerely hope that no elderly playgoers regard it with wistful tenderness, with a tear in the eye and a lump in the throat, for I should be extremely sorry to jar upon such feelings, and, moreover, I should regret that their emotion should not be better spent. I cannot understand how any generation can have thought this a tolerable production. I have, indeed, nothing to say against the chief motive of the play, the contrast, to wit, between honest, homely worth and titled worthlessness, the superiority of people who speak with a Yorkshire accent over those who do not. Possibly the appeal is a little cheap or so, and relies on a not altogether intelligent order of ideas; but since such an appeal created the reputation for pathos of the most famous English novelist of the century, who am I that I should quarrel with it? What I do quarrel with is the complete fatuity with which it is employed. The dialogue, in the first place, is bombastic, not with the rich bombast of "Black Ey'd Susan," but with a bombast merely futile and wearisome. The characterisation is beneath contempt. The heroine, the honest work-girl who should be the centre of sympathy, appears on the most moderate reflection to be an intolerable little prig. Her habit of writing down all her actions at the end of the day from the point of view of their goodness or badness seemed to me quite revolting, and her conduct in spying on a young married woman and meddling in her affairs almost equally so. The construction is bad: the means by which the action is furthered would not have seemed plausible (I should have thought) to a baby. The character of the would-be seducer, a young man who goes about boasting of his insipid conquests, seems to have been stuck in from some French original without the least attempt to make it a possible figure of English life. The nearest approach to wit in the piece is somebody's calling "Lady Leatherbridge" "Lady Leatherbreeches" — and that is hardly a good joke, is it? I pronounce "All that glitters," &c., to be a remarkably bad play.

MISS VANE FEATHERSTONE played the intolerable heroine with skill, contriving to put some feeling into the part. Mr. Harry Nicholls was not very funny as the funny man of the piece: the effect would have been better, I think, if he played more slowly, with a Yorkshire brogue, and not with a lively London air. Mr. Charles Fulton spoke his lines very well as the homely hero. Miss Kearney made something of a low comedy part, and Miss Halstan, whom I do not remember to have seen before, brought a charming appearance and carriage to the assistance of a small part.

ANOTHER play which pleased our remote forefathers has been revived at the Criterion. "Betsy" is not a miracle of wit, but there is much amusing folly in it. I liked Miss Hughes's Betsy as well as any I have seen: it was attractive in its demure gaiety. Mr. Welch was comically unctuous as the tutor.

WHEN "A Man About Town" was produced at the Avenue I happened to be in the country. The critics have not been enthusiastic about it, but Mr. Archer says it is no worse than most such things, and Miss May Edouin is an interesting beginner, in that she shows signs of an instinct for playing, and Miss Alma Stanley has one of the very best presences on the stage.

MUSIC.

ON the last day of the present month occurs the hundredth anniversary of the birth of Franz Schubert, an important event in the history of music which will no doubt be celebrated in becoming fashion by various musical societies at home and abroad. I wonder, indeed, that a special festival has not already been announced here. In the departments of orchestral, chamber, and vocal music Schubert has left imperishable monuments of his genius; and many an interesting programme could be drawn up. The critical edition of the composer's complete works published by Messrs. Breitkopf & Härtel contains many compositions, especially songs, of the finest quality, which, as yet, are practically unknown. There is, then, a fine field for exploration.

EVERYTHING relating to Schubert is eminently romantic—not only his music, but also his life, his early and tragic death, and the tardy discovery, first by Schumann, then by Sir George Grove and Sir Arthur Sullivan, of some of his most precious manuscripts. There are few names, whether in art or literature, surrounded by so much that is marvellous, mysterious, and also melancholy. Schubert was heaven-taught, and how he came to write such wonderful music must have been almost as great a mystery to him as to us. It is extraordinary how men of genius not only overcome disadvantages of humble birth, of injudicious, if not unkind, parents, and of irregular initiation into the technique of their art, but actually derive nourishment and strength therefrom. They learn, and from early age, to rely upon themselves, and probably thus find out that by helping themselves they are helped by heaven. If Beethoven's father had been wise and kind; if the Elector had not been driven away from his palace at Bonn; and if Haydn by firmness and patience had tamed the wild, wayward young man committed to his care—then, indeed, Beethoven might have become a happier and more prosperous man, but it is quite possible that we should not have had the "Eroica," "C minor," and "Choral" Symphonies. And so, in like manner, with Schubert, whose music is the outcome of his Bohemian life with its many sorrows and disappointments.

MOZART, Beethoven, Schubert, Wagner, were always longing for peace and quiet, and for a moderate, settled income, so that, free from cares and anxiety, they might devote their best powers to their art. Wagner, during the later years of his life, realised his wishes, but it was otherwise with the other three. And for art their disappointments proved great gain. Schubert himself recognised this, for he wrote in his diary: "Grief sharpens the understanding and strengthens the soul, whereas joy seldom troubles itself about the former, and makes the latter either effeminate or frivolous." And again: "My productions in music are the product of the understanding, and spring from my sorrow; those only which are the product of pain seem to please the great world most." When the composer penned these words he was in a truly philosophical frame of mind.

SCHUBERT was a most prolific composer, and naturally wrote much which the world will willingly let die. Musical literature is ever increasing in quantity, and as centuries roll by the best only will survive. Although, however, the works by which the composer will achieve immortality may not be very numerous, his music is at times so unequal, that often in the midst of what for Schubert was ordinary, every-day writing, one comes across wonderful passages, true flashes of genius. And thus it happens that nearly everything he wrote possesses some kind of interest. Among the least known of his works are his operas and operettas, and for the simple reason that some have never been performed, others only a few times in Germany. They contain some of his loveliest—some of his grandest—music; yet for more than one reason it may be doubted whether the revival of even the best in its entirety would prove a success. By way of experiment, however, such a revival would be extremely interesting. It was in the Lied that Schubert displayed his richest lyrical and dramatic gifts. In small things he was greatest: in art, as in nature, value is not measured by size.

MR. CHAPPELL commenced the new year on Monday with an excellent programme. Beethoven's Quartet in F minor (Op. 95), carefully and reverently interpreted by Lady Hallé and Messrs. Ries, Gibson, and Piatti, does more than "share" with the Rasoumowski Quartet in F major the glories of the composer's "second manner"; it gives a foretaste of the glories of the third. Part of the strength of the music lies in its wonderful conciseness; in his later quartets Beethoven indulged in lengths not always "heavenly." The other concerted work was Tchaikowski's Trio in A minor for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, first introduced here by the late Sir Charles Hallé at one of his chamber concerts. It is dedicated "A La Mémoire d'un Grand Artiste," and that artist is said to have been Nicholas, brother of the still more famed Anton Rubinstein. The opening movement, Pezzo Elegiaco, admirably clear in structure, has power and charm; there is nobility in the thematic material, while clever developments and constant variety of rhythm keep the listener ever on the alert. The Tema con Variazioni which follows is, however, the most characteristic of the three movements. The theme itself, simple in character, is most engaging; in the variations the composer displays both skill and imagination. Some are quiet and pensive, others quaint and even humorous. There are two—the one in tempo di valse, the other in tempo di mazurka—which, though clever, seem to me to fall far below the high level of the rest. In the mazurka the composer evidently aimed at striking contrast, and so far succeeded; but there are unpleasant, as well as pleasant, contrasts. The variation which precedes, with its pathetic melody given out by the muted violin, and mysterious arpeggio accompaniment for the pianoforte, is of fine solemn effect, and surely ought to have been followed by something more noble in character. The Finale—really another variation in extended form—is chiefly remarkable for its vigour and its mournful close. The Trio was well performed by Mr. Leonard Borwick, Lady Hallé, and Signor Piatti.

MR. BORWICK played as solos Chopin's Nocturne in C minor and Ballade in G minor. Few pianists successfully interpret the music —laden with sentiment and rich in varying mood—of the Polish composer, and of those few, Mr. Borwick, so far as I can judge, is as yet not one. His reading is too matter-of-fact; he seems to be trying to make his audience understand rather than feel, whereas Chopin's music demands treatment of quite opposite kind. Mr. Borwick is, however, an excellent pianist, and his readings of classical works are justly admired. As an encore he played a short Brahms piece.

MISS EVANGELINE FLORENCE sang Handel's lovely air "Care Selve" in most refined, artistic fashion. Although recalled several times she would not give an encore, and in this she set an excellent example. Her second song was Bishop's "Lo! here the gentle lark," with flute obbligato (Mr. J. Lemmoné). The song in its way is effective enough, but it was not a suitable one for the high class programme I have been describing.

ADVANCE programmes of the Saturday Promenade Concerts have been forwarded to me, and I am pleased to see that novelties in moderate quantity still continue the order of the day. On January 16 a "Scherzino Valse" and "Danse de Bacchanale" will be introduced, and on February 6 an Orchestral Legend, "Undine," by Amy Elise Horrocks. For January 23 a Suite entitled "Izél," by Gabriel Pierné, is announced, and for February 27 a Symphonic Poem, "Le Chasseur Maudit," by César Franck. The Symphony by the last named, played by M. Lamoureux, created a desire to know more of this composer. Late experience of modern programme music has not been altogether pleasant, yet I hope that Franck's "Hunter," though cursed, may prove a welcome guest.

I REMIND my readers that the second performance of Saint-Saëns' "Samson et Dalila" will be given at the Queen's Hall on the afternoon of January 16, when Mr. Newman may reasonably count upon a full hall.

SCIENCE.

THE elevation of Sir Joseph Lister, P.R.S., to the peerage is, I believe, the highest honour which has ever been conferred on the medical profession in this country. Nor could a worthier representative have been selected for it than the man whose discovery of the antiseptic treatment has effected a revolution in hospital treatment, and saved more lives in its time than all the wars have destroyed. Sir Joseph Lister, as often happens, has been less of a prophet in his own country than in others. In Italy, it is recorded, he once made as triumphal a progress as Cimabue's "Madonna"; but here, till now, his work has been accepted with that moderate fervour which characterises the gratitude of the Anglo-Saxon race. Perhaps the slight infusion of vivisection which was necessary to perfect it has something to do with the matter.

Of the late Prof. Emil Du Bois-Reymond the British Medical Journal says:

"He is one of the last to join the majority of a band of physiologists which included Carl Ludwig and Helmholtz, who rather more than half a century ago rescued physiology from the hands of vitalists and mysticists, and made it an exact science. They employed the methods of physics and chemistry to the investigation of vital problems, and it is to such methods alone that physiology owes the progress of the last fifty years."

It was to the electrical side of this science that Du Bois-Reymond particularly devoted himself, and his researches in this field have laid the foundation of all our knowledge in connexion with animal electricity. So high an authority as Prof. Burdon Sanderson has remarked that "Du Bois-Reymond probably never made an incorrect observation or performed a faulty experiment." It might be of interest to mention that an excellent portrait of the deceased professor, made only last year, has been included by Mr. Rudolf Lehmann in the collection of sketches published under the title of Men and Women of the Century by Messrs. George Bell & Sons.

To an ordinary scientific mind the phrase "liquid crystals" is a contradiction in terms. Crystalline properties, as generally laid down, are such as to exclude any but a solid structure, and a discovery which showed that crystals might exist in a liquid condition would tend to revolutionise the whole modern theory regarding the structure of liquids and solids. This is the view taken by Prof. H. A. Miers in an article which he contributes to the current number of Science Progress, and it forms the introduction to some very curious discoveries by Dr. Lehmann, of Karlsruhe, the great German microscopist. Some years ago a well-known botanist found that benzoate of cholesteryl possessed two melting points, melting first at 145 deg. to a dull, and then at 178 deg. to a clear, liquid; also that at the former it seemed to possess the property of double refraction. Shortly afterwards other compounds were prepared which possessed the same peculiarity, among them being azoxyphenol and azoxyanisole. These substances can be melted from the crystalline state (commonly so called) to the liquid, on a microscope stage, and at their first melting point are strongly doubly refractive, becoming dark four times when rotated between a pair of crossed Nicol prisms. On the strength of this discovery, Dr. Lehmann pronounces the drops to be really liquid crystals, and although in respect of their optical properties they do not follow out strict crystalline rules, there is no doubt that the drops are doubly refractive, possess a symmetrical disposition of their optical properties, and are "unlike any other drops or any other liquid previously described."

In the same number as the above is a short but interesting paper on artificial variation produced in the larvæ of sea-urchins, by Mr. H. M. Vernon, showing the value of those studies in marine biology which were first started by Anton Dohrn at Naples, and are now carried out almost everywhere. The importance of variation as a factor in the great evolution question is well recognised. Many vexed points would be solved if the cause of the continual tendency in the organism to change were once conclusively settled. One side believes that the tendency is inherent, or is bound up with questions of sex, which cannot be experimentally tested; another, that it depends on the changing action of environment, which can. Mr. Vernon's experiments are in this latter direction, and consist in noting the alterations in growth and development which result from changes in the temperature and salinity of the water the specimens were reared in, and various other modifications which might occur in nature. The most fruitful of his results is the discovery that the temperature of the water at the moment the young ova are fertilised has an enormous effect on their after growth. This is a point which calls for further investigation.

Most workers in the higher regions of science have nowadays to be familiar with French, German, and Italian, and may consider themselves lucky to escape Japanese. The days when continental science ran on different lines from British, and was distinguished in itself by nationalities, are past. Science is now cosmopolitan, and when the Royal Society's catalogue scheme is completed will become universal. Yet outside the ranks of higher science are many who take an interest in scientific work and to whom the German publications, at any rate, are a sealed book. In their interests more should be done to bring German work forward by means of translations. Tyndall was not above such work, and, indeed, it should be performed by men of eminence. The American journal Science has frequently conferred real service in this respect, and its current number over here (December 25) contains an excellent example in the form of a translation, with comments, by Prof. H. C. Jones, of Nernst's address on physical chemistry, delivered at the opening of the new Göttingen laboratory.

THE term physical chemistry is in itself a comparatively new one, indicating the growth of a new science. In the early days of Davy and Gay Lussac, when men were engaged in discovering the fundamental laws of matter, chemistry and physics went together. Then came a period when they separated, the chemists Berzelius, Liebig, Hofmann, &c., devoting themselves to chemistry pure and simple, while men like Hertz, Weber, and Helmholtz were no less distinctly physicists. Within the last decade there has grown up a fringe of subjects between the two sciences which requires the co-operation and knowledge of both. The names of Landolt, Ostwald, Nernst, Van't Hoff, and Arrhenius are well known in connexion with this school of thought which has grown up round the second named at Leipsic; nor are we lacking in good representatives here. The discoveries of Lord Rayleigh and Prof. Ramsay, the joint work of Prof. Dewar and Prof. Fleming, the extensive researches of men like Prof. S. P. Thompson and Mr. J. W. Swan, are for the most part dependent upon a nice intermixture of chemical and physical learning, without which they could never have been carried out.

PROF. JONES, the translator of Dr. Nernst's paper, who holds the chair of physics at John Hopkins University, goes more minutely into the work of the physico-chemical school than I can do here. Among its more important generalisations—and generalisations are the cream of many discoveries—he cites that of Van't Hoff, that "optical activity" is due to the presence of an asymmetric carbon atom, which formed a basis for all the recent developments in what is known as stereochemistry. The same discoverer's application of the gas laws to solutions, and its counterpart, the Arrhenius theory of electrolytic dissociation, have been no less fruitful in results, though the latter is not always accepted. Ostwald, the father of the science (since Faraday), is pre-eminently a systematiser and arranger of facts. Nernst has revolutionised our notions in regard to primary batteries since the appearance of his memorable paper in 1889. These are but a few of the things which might be named. The work of Raoult and Beckmann on freezing points and vapour tensions, of Le Blanc on polarisation, and of Ramsay and Shields on surface tension, are among other records of this ten-year-old school, which already numbers in its ranks some of the very highest names in science.

THE latest result of Prof. Röntgen's discovery is a wonderful interest in the properties of light and optical phenomena. No more beautiful or ingenious exposition of the subject has ever been made than that with which Prof. Silvanus Thompson has been delighting the crowded audiences of the Royal Institution. So neat, so happy, and so homely are the illustrations of the not too simple laws of optics which this gifted lecturer manages to introduce, that one expects at every moment to hear the "no deception" formula of the drawing-room conjurer. By an odd coincidence another, not less brilliant, lecturer has been filling the gap which Prof. Thompson's absence presumably makes in Finsbury. This is Prof. J. A. Fleming, who has been delivering a popular course on optics at the London Institution. Prof. Fleming's audience is one of a very different kind from that which assembles in Albemarle-street, and his lectures have not the same sparkle and originality that are called for in the fashionable home of science. None the less, he has been followed with an interest that Messrs. Maskelyne and Cooke might envy.

THE BOOK MARKET.

ARE THE OLDER NOVELISTS HOLD-ING THEIR OWN?

A SYMPOSIUM OF BOOKSELLERS.

IF our readers will bear with a couple of columns of small print, they will find the following answers to the question which heads this column interesting. They have been supplied to us by our correspondents in the book trade. The desirability of putting such a question to practical booksellers had been suggested to us by the state of our table during the three months which preceded Christmas. Could the good old novelists be resisting such a mill-stream of new fiction? If not, what courage might they gain from defeat, what resolution from despair?

The replies which we print are thoughtful and full of interesting agreements, and interesting differences, and they have the note of actuality. We gather that in the opinion of leading booksellers the sale of the works of the older novelists depends greatly on the manner in which they are presented by modern publishers.

The incidental criticisms on modern writers which crop up in these replies are distinctly interesting, and in nearly all there is expressed loyalty to the old writers who "burn with a gemlike flame" instead of merely blazing and subsiding into cold ashes.

LONDON.

Messrs. A. & F. Denny, the well-known booksellers of the Strand, send us the following reply to our question:

We have no hesitation in saying that the following half-dozen writers show no signs of diminishing popularity, but quite the reverse—viz., Charles Dickens, Sir Walter Scott, Thackeray, George Eliot, C. Kingsley, and O. Brontë.

There is, too, an undoubtedly ready and quick sale for the "best" of the following:—Lord Lytton, Ainsworth, Wilkie Collins, Charles Reade, Lever, Whyte Melville, Hawley Smart, &c. It is, however, hardly an increasing sale, nor can we compare it with the demand for R. L. Stevenson, or some of the more popular writers of to-day, as Stanley Weyman, Barrie, Crockett, Ian Maclaren, Merriman, Anthony Hope, G. Meredith, Rudyard Kipling, Thomas Hardy, Rider Haggard, Conan Doyle, F. M. Crawford, M. Corelli, and Mrs. Humphry Ward, and others, each of which could, we think, point to record sales for their new books.

The publication of dainty illustrated and well-printed editions has had the effect of drawing attention to some writers hitherto somewhat neglected, such as Jane Austen, T. L. Peacock, and M. Edgeworth. The great and increasing demand for the fiction of our best writers is hardly a matter for surprise, when we compare it with the mass of so-called fiction published during the last few years, and at which ten years ago most publishers would have looked with suspicion. At no period have books of such high value as those of our "great novelists" been produced so well and at such small cost, and each is adding to his or her ever widening circle of admirers and readers.

To sum up, our belief is that the "great writers" we have mentioned in the earlier portion of our letter are not only holding their own but are growing in popularity year by year, in spite of the enormous opposition they have to encounter from more modern writers, and in some cases imitators.

Mr. Thomas Bumpus, Director of the firm of John and Edward Bumpus, Limited, writes to us:

In some cases, the old great novelists have unquestionably lost ground; nevertheless, our experience is, that whatever new publications see the light, the public retains all its old affection for Scott, Thackeray, Dickens, George Eliot, Jane Austen, Whyte Melville, and in a lesser degree, for Wilkie Collins and Charles Reade, and these feelings of loyalty and preference are shown year after year in a practical manner that defies refutation. It is true that novel readers of the present day are insatiable in their appetite for light and sensational literature; but I think it is a case of "Revenons à nos moutons." They return with a keener zest to the older favourites.

GLASGOW.

Messrs. W. & R. Holmes write:

Regarding the works of the older novelists, some of whom may now be termed English classics, the sale of Scott, Dickens, and Thackeray has been going on for years with extraordinary vigour, and is not apparently affected in the slightest by the present-day writers; while Collins, Reade, Eliot, Lytton, and Trollope have all a ready sale. Some of the others, such as Ainsworth and James, are not so much in demand within the last year or two. The demand for Dumas is increasing daily.

BRISTOL.

Messrs. William George's Sons write:

Of the older novelists the case of Anthony Trollope was admirably set forth in your last issue. That of Lytton is very similar. Ainsworth, Wilkie Collins, and Charles Reade are quite out of demand. The illustrators and reprinters of Jane Austen are much to be thanked, and have received reward in large sales. Marryat is alive again from the same cause. Scott sells in any form, but there is room for a tasteful reissue yet. George Eliot sells well as a still copyright author. Dickens and Thackeray go off in a humdrum way; in both these cases there is a large public looking forward to a new style of publishing, when the remarkable experience with Jane Austen will be repeated.

CLIFTON.

Messrs. J. Baker & Son write:

The answer must be twofold. The great writers of the immediate past do not sell in rushes as do the works of the modern author who "blazes"; neither do they have so large a sale at Christmas as formerly; but throughout the year the works of Scott, Dickens, Thackeray, George Eliot, and Charles Kingsley have a larger sale than any modern writer. The tendency of the modern novel is to blaze and die. The successes of last year are the dead stock of to-day; but there are certain living authors whose works sell steadily; and of dead authors Jane Austen has had a curious revival, her works selling freely, and Charles Reade's novels sell well in cheap editions, but Anthony Trollope, Wilkie Collins, and Ainsworth are rarely asked for.

DARLINGTON.

Messrs. Thomas Brear & Co. write:

Our experience is that most of the older novelists still stand firm in their position amid the prodigious mushroom growth of modern fiction. Though Dickens and Thackeray do not sell as rapidly as they did a few years ago, there is still a steady demand for their novels, as well as of Scott, Brontë, George Eliot, and Kingsley.

Lytton is very slow, and Trollope, Harrison Ainsworth, and Cooper are seldom asked for now. Jane Austen sells only in illustrated editions, and Charles Reade is gradually becoming "a man of one book"—The Cloister and the Hearth. With a few exceptions, the modern novel has a very brief existence.

FOLKESTONE.

Mr. William E. Thorpe writes:

I have no hesitation in saying that the demand at the circulating libraries is all for the newest books, and the majority read little else but novels. Of course there are always a certain number of readers to be found for good travels and biographies, but I regret to say the old standard authors are almost entirely neglected. I am now speaking of such libraries as our own, which are patronised by the better class of people of the town; but with respect to the free library I cannot say for certain, but I am under the impression the old standard authors are far more read than they are in such up-to-date establishments as ours. Since two years ago the tone and tendency of the novels were certainly immoral, and the more they were so the larger the circulation; but I am happy to say I think that that day is past, and the novel readers of to-day certainly prefer a higher and purer tone of fiction.

BOURNEMOUTH.

Mr. Horace G. Commin writes:

Taking the older novelists as a whole. I do not think they hold their own as they should, but wherever cheap—by this I do not necessarily mean low price—new editions are published, especially when well done, there is a considerable revival in the sale.

Scott sells as well now as in the last five years, and better than ten years ago.

Dickens is likely to have a larger number of readers this year than for many years, because of the new "Gad's Hill" edition.

Thackeray is always about the same, and has not fallen off, but has an increasing number of readers.

Trollope would have a larger number of readers if there was a good edition in good type; I am inclined to think there is room for this.

George Eliot is still in very considerable demand, and holds her own.

Jane Austen has still a large sale, thanks to the illustrations by Hugh Thomson, and also the good type editions which have of late years appeared.

Lytton and Ainsworth have fallen off rather.

Wilkie Collins and Charles Reade have not quite so large a number of readers as they deserve.

The Brontës and Mrs. Gaskell have a very large and a growing number of readers.

Fennimore Cooper has nothing like the number of readers that he had, and has fallen off largely.

Captain Marryat still a large number, but does not keep the stand he should.

Whyte Melville has fallen off somewhat. Charles Kingsley still continues to hold his own.

The chief reason, I believe, of any decline in the sale and number of readers in any case (except Fennimore Cooper) is largely due to the poorness of type and paper on which many of the older authors are published.

CARDIFF.

Mr. W. Hogg writes:

I find that Dickens and Scott enjoy a very steady and constant sale, and hold their own with the newer novelists. I do not think Thackeray has had justice done to him by his publishers, some of his works being issued in two volumes only. What seems to be wanted is a cheap one-volume edition to make him more popular, still he is constantly selling.

Anthony Trollope has a slow sale.

Lord Lytton is not often inquired for.

Harrison Ainsworth is declining in popularity.

Wilkie Collins sells well in cheap form.

Charles Reade has sold very well until quite recently.

George Eliot has a very steady sale—quite popular.

Jane Austen is rarely asked for now.

BIRMINGHAM.

Mr. Charles Linnell, of the firm of Cornish Brothers, writes:

Our experience is that Scott is the only one of the older writers whose books have not suffered by the writers of to-day. The sales of Dickens and of Thackeray and of George Eliot are fairly maintained, but the novels of Lord Lytton, Harrison Ainsworth, Wilkie Collins, Charles Reade, and Lever are seldom asked for. There is a sustained demand for Mrs. Gaskell, Charles Kingsley, the Brontës, Mrs. Craik, Jane Austen, and Henry Kingsley.

Of the older living writers, Miss Yonge, Miss Braddon, George MacDonald, R. D. Blackmore, Mrs. Oliphant, and William Black are in constant demand. It is to be regretted that Anthony Trollope is neglected. This may be accounted for by the fact that no edition of his works is to be had in an attractive form.

It is interesting and instructive to note that the English people still have the old love for a story pure and simple. Those novelists who delight to dwell upon disagreeable subjects, upon social and other evils, should take warning, for the sale of those novels which are produced for no other purpose than to take their readers into the "alms of realism" is on the wane. Historical novels, tinged with the quaintness of the age to which they belong, are most approved.

BOOKSELLING NOTES.

THE Publishers' Circular supplies with its usual punctuality the statistics of the literature of 1896. In the following table, which contains the essential figures, a signifi-new books published in 1896, and b new editions.

These figures, compared with those which were published for 1895, give the following comparisons. In Theology and Poetry there is neither increase nor decrease. History, Law, Political Economy, Art, and Fiction show an increase over 1895, the advance being largest in the case of Fiction, which has put forth one hundred more books and two hundred more new editions than in the previous year. Educational books and books of travel, belles-lettres, and miscellaneous books have been published in fewer numbers. In the end, we have a total net increase over 1895 of rather more than sixty volumes.

MESSRS. SOTHEY are now cataloguing the splendid library of the Earl of Ashburnham preparatory to its sale by auction. The rare MSS., we understand, will not be included in the general sale, it being the wish of the owner to find a single purchaser for these.

It will be remembered that the present Earl offered these MSS., soon after inheriting them, to the British Museum for a sum of £160,000, and that Mr. Gladstone, as Chancellor of the Exchequer, could only see his way to grant a sum sufficient for the Museum to acquire a portion of the MSS.—those concerned with English history. Should private negotiations fail these MSS. may after all come under the hammer with the books.

MESSRS. ROUTLEDGE & Co. may claim, we suppose, to have invented the sixpenny paper-backed standard novel. It is just thirty years since the firm began to put sixpenny novels on the market. To-day there is no more familiar sight in booksellers' shops than the stacks of cheap novels, in their bright pictorial covers, issued by this firm. The cheapening of paper and printing has enabled Messrs. Routledge to so improve on their early record that their threepenny novels of to-day are superior to the sixpenny ones of yesterday.

At this moment Messrs. Routledge have in preparation eight standard novels, of which the copyrights have run out, and eight detective stories by such authors as A. K. Green, Frank Pinkerton, and Emile Gaboriau; all these will be issued in the size of 8½ inches by 5½ inches, with pictorial covers, at threepence. A quarter of a million copies are already ordered by the trade.

"ARTHUR PENDENYS" writes very brightly to his Belinda this month, in which he remarks: "They are booming Gladstone again." Mr. Pendenys prettily proceeds to extend the "boom" by sending Belinda an examination paper, based on Mr. Gladstone's interesting letter on book collecting, which it was our privilege to give to the world a fortnight ago. The humour of the following questions will be appreciated by our readers:

"State all you know about Mrs. Hannah More. By what process do we arrive at her age and circumstance when Dr. Johnson called her 'a saucy girl'?"

"Explain the Law of Compensation whereby a bookseller who charged four pounds for Addison's Spectator could afford to do book-binding for nothing."

"Is anything known of any one deliberately asking a Piccadilly bookseller to give away a copy of the Lyttelton-Gladstone Translations on vellum, or to give away any book? If so, state all you know of what took place on such an occasion."

THE late Sir Henry Parkes was an ardent collector of autographs, and his treasures have just gone the way of such things: they have gone under the hammer. The Daily Chronicle thinks, and is probably right, that the collection would have brought a far larger sum in London than in Sydney. There, one bookseller had the hardihood to offer only £450 for the lot, and was refused. But the separate lots put up fetched very moderate prices, one fine batch, containing autographs of the Duke of Wellington, Talleyrand, Victor Hugo, De Quincey, Southey, Cardinal Wiseman, and Lord Lytton, being secured for thirty guineas. Many of these autographs will probably make a quick voyage to London after all.

BOOKS RECEIVED.

THE Nile of literature is beginning to rise again. But our list of books still betokens the unsettled season following Christmas. Educational books are appearing fast in anticipation of the re-assembling of the schools. Cæsar and Cornelius Nepos are quite accustomed to see themselves in new editions directly after Christmas; they have so long been habituated to going new-bound to their conflict with the British schoolboy at this season. More characteristically modern is the fact that Pope and Milton jostle them, with their lines all numbered, their grammatical forms discussed, and their meanings analysed. The Cambridge Milton for schools of which we have the new volume, containing Books ix. and x. of Paradise Lost, would have astonished even those schoolmasters whom Charles Lamb described as "new" in comparison with the "old." It would have astonished even Dr. Arnold.

Our short list of new books or editions in Fiction includes Messrs. Macmillan & Co.'s reprint, in their series of Standard Novels, of Miss Edgeworth's Belinda. The volume is illustrated by Miss Chris Hammond. Here is one more book to swell that army of the older novels which many of our bookseller correspondents assure us, this week, still keep the field.

Dr. Murray gives us an earnest of his industry in the New Year by sending out another small instalment of the D portion of his great Dictionary. Every student of the language, nay every lover of good work of whatever kind, will wish Dr. Murray health, strength, and hope in his unique undertaking.

Under Theology we have received, rather late, The People's Bible History, edited by the Rev. Geo. C. Lorimer, LL.D., and containing an Introduction by Mr. Gladstone. The volume is issued by the Christian Commonwealth Company.

The Builder's Album of Royal Academy Architecture, issued from the office of The Builder, is a handsome and interesting publication.

Under Biography comes the book of the week: Field-marshal Lord Roberts's Forty-one Years in India (Bentley & Son.) This work, so long expected, and now so widely welcomed, appears in two handsome large octavo volumes, bound in blue cloth, at the price of 36s. We shall be in no way anticipating a reviewer's treatment of this book if we simply quote its dedication. This reads as follows:

"TO THE COUNTRY TO WHICH I AM PROUD OF BELONGING, TO THE ARMY TO WHICH I AM SO DEEPLY INDEBTED, AND TO MY WIFE,
WITHOUT WHOSE LOVING HELP
MY 'FORTY-ONE YEARS IN INDIA' COULD NOT BE THE HAPPY RETROSPECT IT IS,
I DEDICATE THIS BOOK."

BOOK REVIEWS REVIEWED.

Bishop Creighton's "Queen Elizabeth," (Rouscod, Valadon.)

"DR. CREIGHTON'S plan," says the Daily News, "is . . . to make the events explain the character, and not to start with any ready-made theory of character as explanatory of the events." "The confession on the part of so eminent an author, that the illustrations form a main element in the work," is said to be "as significant in its way as Macaulay's famous breach with the dignity of history." "Dr. Creighton's study of Elizabeth is not so long as Mr. Froude's, but it gains by its very condensation." The Telegraph criticises "this important historical essay and most attractive of recent picture-books," on the whole, in terms of high commendation, but with reservations: the initial letters are in the wrong style—of the Empire type rather than of the Elizabethan phase of the later Renaissance; the portraits of the Queen are in disorder; the likeness of Philip II. is falsely attributed to Rubens. On the literary side Dr. Creighton is said to have performed his work admirably; and the critic closes the book "strengthened in the conviction that to the Virgin Queen herself we owe, in the main, the greatness of the Elizabethan era." "A unique combination," says the Spectator, "of beautiful pictures and well-written history." "Enemies of Elizabeth may, perhaps, think it too favourable, but no one will deny the interest—nay, the fascination—of the narrative." "Whenever possible, he has given the Queen's, or Burleigh's, or Essex's own words. The result is a wonderful sense of freshness and reality." The Star says it is impossible "to convey by a mere description any adequate idea of the perfection of these illustrations."

"Genius and Degeneration," By William Hirsch. (Heinemann.)

"DR. HIRSCH sits down," says the Morning Post, "before his subject, and in a solid and eminently Teutonic fashion proceeds to demolish the theories of Nordau, one by one, with deliberation and thoroughness." "Dr. Hirsch's views are those of a sensible and learned man." "He is neither so interesting nor so irritating as Herr Nordau." But if in some part of his work he is a trifle heavy, no such criticism can be passed on "Richard Wagner and Psycho-Pathology," which stands out so markedly from the rest as to be "worthy of publication in a separate form." "All lovers of Wagner will rejoice to find in Dr. Hirsch a champion of such appreciative ardour." The British Review thinks that no such serious counterblast was in reality necessary. "For the public was content with the pleasure of hearing that some men with claims to genius were yet at the same time the victims of degrading madness; but they were never converted to the theory that all men of genius were madmen." For his insistence on the remedial forces at work among us," says the Chronicle, "Dr. Hirsch's book is to be commended to watchers of the signs of the times."

Mr. Austin Dobson's Third Series of "Eighteenth Century Vignettes," (Chalko.)

"It is a very pretty and very quaint garden of artificiality," says the Telegraph, "through which Mr. Dobson discreetly guides the sympathetic reader." "Every one," says the Saturday, "admits the skill of Mr. Dobson—a skill which has grown with practice into something like legerdemain." "Mr. Dobson alone among living scholars has the requisite eighteenth century knowledge for such a work of sustained minute erudition." The Spectator writes: "When we have a quantity of this fine [mosaic] work together, we find ourselves with quite a new and familiar knowledge of the outside world of those days." "Now that we have arrived at a third series of these Vignettes, it seems natural that their subjects should be a little less personally interesting; but this does not make them less valuable as studies of the time." "The style," says the Pall Mall, "is as graceful as ever, the wit as pleasant, and the criticism as sound."

Mr. Grant Allen's "Splendid Sin," (White.)

THE National Observer recommends that the book be sent back to the library with all possible speed. "Not that it is dangerous. . . . It is merely nasty, and the nastiness is veiled in an unpleasant atmosphere of canting sanctimoniousness." "The story is utterly unworthy of his abilities," says the Chronicle. "It is not," says the Athenæum, after explaining that the groundwork of the story is the removal of the fear of "inherited tendencies" by the hero's discovery of his mother's dishonour—"it is not, in Mr. Allen's hands, an impressive or splendid performance." The Saturday Review is of another opinion: "It is a skillfully built, entertaining, and amusing book"; but "the lady still falls short of humanity." "If he could start with a little animus against his heroine it would be as well: he is clearly crippled by an exaggerated respect for his feminine ideal."

"The Ban of the Gubbe," by Cedric D. Waldo. (Blackwood.)

"A SINGULARLY ingenious and fascinating romance, written by a distinguished man who . . . has adopted the pseudonym," explains the Daily Telegraph. "The weird story of a legendary folk" [the Fiskmanns, half-man, half-fish] is declared by the Pall Mall Gazette to be "fascinating and absorbing." The Daily News describes the tale as "a fresh and original variant on the old theme of a family pursued by a doom." The author, who is understood to be a new writer, is declared to have in him "the stuff to make a successful story-teller." The Times says Mr. Waldo "has worked out his notion with a great deal of care, and his narrative style is not so stilted . . . as his attempts at dialogue." "There is a certain unpractised ingenuity in the tale of the fish-men which carries the reader along, though the interest never becomes feverishly exciting." Yet the Telegraph considers the book "entitled to a foremost place among the more sensational works of fiction issued during the current year."

A Perfect Lead Pencil.

The Blaisdell Self-Sharpening Pencil.

"A remarkably smart contrivance."

Black and White.

"Surely a boon to all busy people."

Westminster Budget.

"A design in lead pencils that deserves popularity."—Morning Leader.

"I hope he may make a fortune by it."—Truth.

The Blaisdell Self-Sharpening Pencil looks like an ordinary pencil, and is used like an ordinary pencil. It is the same size as an ordinary pencil. It costs no more than an ordinary pencil of the same quality.

But it lasts at the very least twice as long, because there is none of the waste that occurs through breakage of the lead in sharpening a cedar pencil. This is more especially noticeable in the case of blue and red pencils. In using an ordinary coloured pencil, probably half the crayon-lead is wasted in cutting, and another quarter by the lead breaking in use. The Blaisdell coloured pencils waste none of the crayon in cutting, for there is no cutting to be done, and the crayon does not readily break in use. Hence the saving in lead alone is very great, and the saving of time, trouble, and annoyance is greater still. There are no chips, no dirty smears from crayon dust, and a perfect point is produced instantaneously whenever needed. The same is true of the black-lead Blaisdell Pencil.

The paper covering holds firm until it is desired to remove it. Then all that is necessary is to break the outer cover with a knife or pin, and pull off a spiral of paper. The new point is then ready for use.

Blaisdell Pencils, whether black or coloured, are made in but one quality—the best; but the black-lead pencil is made in all grades of hardness for writing or drawing.

The Bulk of the Catalogue is increased by over 80 pages, whilst the price (5s. net) remains the same.

IT WILL BE READY IN A FEW DAYS.

SOME PRESS OPINIONS ON FORMER ISSUES.

"The English Catalogue" is a publication of national importance. There is nothing existing that has any claim to be compared with it as a ready guide to the vast fields of modern publications."—Daily News.

"Such a book is immensely useful to all who have to do with the literature of the day."—Athenæum.

"We need scarcely point out how valuable a work of reference this well-known catalogue affords, as it is not only the names of books which are furnished in these pages, but also the dates of publication, an indication of the size, and the name of the publisher. The principal works imported from the United States of America are also included in this admirable volume."—Daily Telegraph.

"The English Catalogue of Books" is known and appreciated by librarians and those engaged in literary research wherever English books are used, and the new volume of the work is sure of a wide and hearty welcome."—Scotsman.

"To say that it is indispensable to whole classes and interests is mere commonplace. It is in its class the most useful of records.... The entire work is, indeed, a precious record."—Notes and Queries.

New Volume ready January 25th.

ARDEN OF FAVERSHAM. Edited by the Rev.

RONALD BAYNE, University College, Oxford.

The Spectator says:—"Mr. Wells is a true magician... Quite the best novel that has hitherto been inspired by the cult of the wheel.... This 'brilliant and entertaining book'."

THE WHEELS OF CHANGE. By

H. G. WELLS Author of "The Wonderful Visit," &c. With 40 Illustrations by J. Aytton Symington. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

The St. James's Gazette says:—"A surprising, a really remarkable success.... While we were quite alive to his fantastic and abundant originality, we never before gave him credit for so much variety in method, for so much humour, so much vivacity, and, above all, for so delicate and sympathetic a humanity as he displays in 'The Wheels of Change'.... Mr. Wells has done an excellent piece of work, and one that is certain of success."

The Athenæum says:—"The 'Wheels of Change' is even better than the author's amusing and original work called 'The Wonderful Visit'.... So ingeniously does Mr. Wells work together the humour of the big top, the charms of terse and vivid description, and the uncertainties of adventure, and so cleverly and sympathetically does he portray the character of the hero, mixing with his oddities a dash of the true gentleman, that one may fairly assign to 'The Wheels of Change' a high place among current works of fanciful romance."

THE FLAME, FLOWER, and

OTHER STORIES. Written, and Illustrated with about 100 Drawings, by J. F. SULLIVAN. Imperial 16mo, 5s. net.

Mr. H. G. Wells in the Academy says:—"It is long since any new book proffered such delightful entertainment as Mr. J. F. Sullivan has given us.... Whosoever reads this book at my instigation will retain a spark of gratitude towards me on that account.... This fantastic volume is as unique and perfect as mortal enterprise can be."

JOAN SEATON: a Story of Peril-Dion in the Yorkshire Dales. By MARY BEAUMONT Author of "A Ringby Lass." Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

The Daily Telegraph says:—"This remarkable book has three conspicuous merits. First of all it does for an English countryside what Mr. Barrie has done for Thrums and Ian MacLaren for Drumtochty. It reveals the humour, the pathos, the dignity, and the nobility of the Yorkshire dales-folk.... But 'Joan Seaton' has a second merit. It is a noble and a moving story.... And this leads us to the third and most conspicuous merit.... Miss Beaumont.... puts a noble restraint upon herself, and has produced a book in the chaste and exquisite style which was once thought to be a claim upon the attention of the reading world."

The Scotsman says:—"It is admirably written.... The book is a valuable addition to the literature of the Yorkshire Dales."

MISTRESS SPITFIRE: a Romance of the Civil War. By J. S. FLETCHER, Author of "When Charles the First was King." Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

The Scotsman says:—"We follow the developments of the tale with breathless interest. The siege of the Manor House is a well-conceived and spirited business.... It holds its own as a tale of the last page." The Pall Mall Gazette says:—"Original and finely carried out, and a 'rattling good story'.... Mr. Fletcher will go far as a writer of historical novels."

A SPECIAL PROSPECTUS of both the DRAMATISTS and CLASSICS, and the NEW GENERAL CATALOGUE will be sent to any address on receipt of a postcard.

MR. EDWARD CLODD'S NEW BOOK.

PIONEERS OF EVOLUTION

FROM THALES to HUXLEY.

With an Intermediate Chapter on the CAUSES OF ARREST of the MOVEMENT. By EDWARD CLODD, President of the Folk-lore Society, Author of "The Childhood of the World," "The Story of Creation," &c., &c. ILLUSTRATED with PORTRAITS (executed in photogravure) of CHARLES DARWIN, Professor HUXLEY, Mr. ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, and Mr. HERBERT SPENCER. "DARWIN'S THEORY OF THE ORIGIN OF SPECIES" was published nearly forty years ago. The generation which has arisen since then knows little or nothing of the storm which that event aroused; how the "drum ecclesiastic" was beaten, and the world shaken in divers other ways. Hence the story of the "famous victory" should have interest for present-day readers; and it is with this story that this book is largely concerned. But as leading up to modern discoveries and their momentous results, it is needful to trace their source to the Ionian seaboard some twenty-five centuries back; and, as explaining the lateness of the product, it is further needful to show the retarding action of Christian dogma for sixteen hundred years. One important feature of the book is the reference to some original documents which Mr. Herbert Spencer has shown the author, by means of which certain facts are for the first time made public.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 5s. net.

Ready on January 20.

The FIRST TWO VOLUMES of

MR. GRANT ALLEN'S HISTORICAL GUIDES: PARIS. | FLORENCE.

EXTRACT from MR. ALLEN'S INTRODUCTION to the Series:

"The object and plan of these historical handbooks is somewhat different from that of any other guides at present before the public. They do not compete with such existing works; they are rather intended to supplement than to supplant them.... I desire to supply the tourist who wishes to use his travel as a means of culture with such historical and antiquarian information as will enable him to understand, and therefore to enjoy, the architecture, sculpture, painting, and minor arts of the towns he visits."

HODDER & STOUGHTON'S LIST.

THIRD EDITION, COMPLETING 30,000.

Crown 8vo, 5s.

MARGARET OGILVY. By J. M. BARRIE.

"In 'Margaret Ogilvy' everything has been set down, nothing is clouded, nothing concealed, nothing exaggerated. . . . The record is without a jarring passage, and so real is the presentment that it is hard to believe that it is not fiction."—Academy.
"The readers of 'Margaret Ogilvy' will close the volume with the conviction that neither in history nor in literature has the mother of a man of genius ever been made so real, so tender and beautiful, as this. . . . A memorial so exquisite that we shall not be surprised to find 'Margaret Ogilvy' regarded henceforward as the best of his writings."—Daily Chronicle.

Crown 8vo, gilt top, 6s.

KATE CARNEGIE and THOSE MINISTERS. By IAN MACLAREN.

"Ian MacLaren has given us another delightful book, full of the same marvellous insight into character, and touching with even greater power the twin spring of laughter and tears."—Literary World.

Crown 8vo, gilt top, 6s.

THE LAND o' the LEAL. By David LYALL.

"The tales are tender and pathetic, permeated with simple religious feeling, much more likely to edify the ordinary reader than what are known as Sunday books. The book is a triumphant proof that it is possible to write Scotch stories in a tongue that is understood of persons who dwell on this side of the Tweed."—Times.

Fifth Thousand. With Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

CHARLOTTE BRONTË and HER CIRCLE. By CLEMENT K. SHORTER.

"We owe him a debt of gratitude that cannot easily be repaid. With extraordinary success he has brought to light and placed in the hands of his readers all those records of Charlotte Brontë's noble life that were untouched and almost unsuspected by previous writers."—Sir Wemyss Reid in the Nineteenth Century.

Second Edition Now Ready.

THE YEAR OF SHAME. By William Watson. With an Introduction by the Bishop of Hereford. Fcap. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

"Mr. Watson's kindling poems, with their noble imagery and genuine emotion, remain, we think, one of the finest appeals to the conscience of a country that this generation has heard. Let us add that the Bishop of Hereford's introduction to the new edition seems to us entirely worthy of the occasion and the subject."—Leader in the Westminster Gazette.

"It is this very note of red-hot sincerity which gives the sonnets their chief value. It is when they are most savage that they are best. . . . It is not too much to say that, in its way, it is to our perplexed and devious generation a prophetic cry."—Daily Chronicle.

THE CHILDREN. By Alice Meynell. With a Title-page and Cover Design by Charles Robinson. Fcap. 8vo, Second Edition, 3s. 6d. net.

"The best book of prose that Mrs. Meynell has put forth—the best in point of style, the best in point of literary treatment. . . . Both as observation and as interpretation this volume is delightful. The 'darling young' have never before been written about with more understanding and appreciation."—Globe.

IN the GARDEN of PEACE. By Helen Milman (Mrs. Caldwell Crofton). With 24 Illustrations by Edmund H. New. Crown 8vo, Second Edition, 6s. net.

"Of flowers and their countless charms there is much that is both truly and delicately observed; and of birds and their song, their ways and characteristics, there is yet more recorded, not less fine and true, yet with an additional freshness and piquancy that cannot fail to delight all who are interested in the theme."—British Review.

"Mr. New's beautiful illustrations would alone make the book valuable."—Statist.

MAKE BELIEVE. By H. D. Lowry. Illustrated by Charles Robinson. Crown 8vo, gilt edges, or uncut, 5s. net.

"A delightful and idyllic story. . . . Mr. Charles Robinson has embellished the story with most dainty examples of the art in which he is taking such an unassailable place; some of the illustrations are better than anything he has done before."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"As beautiful within as it is beautiful to outward view."—British Review.

VIGNETTES. By Hubert Crakanthorpe. Fcap. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

"There is a real genius in his impressionist sketches. . . . details so artistically presented that a picture of the whole scene starts up before the mind's eye in a moment."—New Saturday.

FRESH FICTION.

SOME WHIMS of FATE. By Menie Muriel Dowie. Post 8vo, coloured edges, 2s. 6d. net.

"Five very clever tales, original and unconventional in treatment. . . . There is plenty of variety of scene."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"Entitles Miss Dowie to a high rank among the English writers who can succeed with that peculiarly difficult form of fiction—the conte."—Academy.

"Told with all the brightness of a true artist, and of fascinating interest."—Gentleman.

SHAPES in the FIRE: a Mid-Winter Night's Entertainment. By M. P. SHIEL, Author of "Prince Zaleski." Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

"Not unworthy of Poe himself."—Speaker.

"Done with consummate insight and skill, and the book is sure to meet with a warm welcome from thinkers."—Western Morning News.

MARIS STELLA. By Marie Clothilde Balfour. (Keynote Series.) Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

"An exceedingly well-written story. . . . There are some passages which recall Pierre Loti at his best."—British Review.

"Miss Balfour writes delicately, and displays a literary fastidiousness which reminds us of Mr. Pater. . . . She has the finer perceptions of the artist; she has imbued her own spirit with the colour-sense of the surroundings of her characters."—Pall Mall Gazette.

IN SCARLET and GREY: Stories of Soldiers and Others. By FLORENCE HENNIKER. With THE SPECTRE of the REAL. By FLORENCE HENNIKER and THOMAS HARDY. (Keynotes Series.) Second Edition. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

"The work of a keen and sympathetic observer of life endowed with a simple and graphic literary style. They are realistic in the true sense of the word, and are full of deep though restrained pathos."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"A collection of profoundly melancholy stories, which, nevertheless, make extremely agreeable reading."—Graphic.

MY BROTHER By Vincent Brown. Square 16mo (Pierrot's Library), 2s. net.

"Paul Penfold . . . is a really beautiful creation, who recalls some of the similar work of George Eliot."—Glasgow Herald.

"So delicate, so genuine a piece of work as this comes into a reader's hand but seldom. . . . Paul Penfold is stamped with human reality."—Bookman.

"A good, sound, rattling tale of thrilling adventure. . . . Like 'The Red Badge of Courage,' Captain Coignet yields a richer fund of entertainment than the mere glory of romance. The actors in their halcyon as they lived play out their parts before us. . . . All these matters, and a thousand more equally terrible, and related with equal vividness, we find in the pages of this incomparable French narrative."—Morning Leader.

SENTIMENTAL TOMMY.

By J. M. BARRIE.

The St. James's Gazette says:—"Exceedingly fascinating and delightful... The study of Tommy's character is, indeed, as subtle and vital as it is fresh and inspiring.... Mr. Barrie has done few things finer than the brother-and-sister love of Tommy and Elsie, or more touching than the elfish heroism of little Grizel."

A PURITAN'S WIFE.

By MAX PEMBERTON.

The British Weekly says:—"A Puritan's Wife" is without question Mr. Pemberton's best story. The descriptions of plague-stricken London remind us of the vivid pictures of Defoe. The heroine, Lady Marjorie, wins the reader's affection from the beginning. Israel Wolf is the most original and powerful character which Mr. Pemberton has ever drawn."

IBSEN'S NEW PLAY.

John Gabriel Borkman: a Play in Four Acts.
By Henrik Ibsen. Translated from the Norwegian by William Archer. (Heinemann.)

IN this new play Ibsen, always terrible in his character of the Plain Dealer, is plainer than ever; but his terrors this time have the fullest measure of his fascination. No doubt they need it, in view of the world's petulant weakness. If his characters were a whit less intensely interesting, we could not bear the frightfully true things they say and do. If the scenery were less ghostly it could not take us so far out of the prosaic atmosphere in which we have the courage of our Philistinism. Even as it is, cries of outrage arise; and every duffer deplores some "questionable" passage which he (being a duffer) would not have written. Borkman's observation, that "if the worst comes to the worst, one woman can always take the place of another," is deemed out of place in a respectable play; and the elopement, which must needs have been a bad example to the young at best, is voted "unnecessarily" shocking because of a third party—a girl—whose presence is accounted for by the lady in these appalling terms: "Men are so unstable! And women too! When Erhart is done with me, and I with him, then it will be well for us both that he, poor fellow, should have some one to fall back upon."

Our inveterate habit of criticising fiction on the lines of Mrs. Raddle will always get us into difficulties with Ibsen. Mrs. Raddle, it will be remembered, had a fixed conception of manliness which included an instant readiness on the part of every true husband to fight cabmen underpaid by his wife. "Raddle ain't like a man," she said, when Mr. Raddle disappointed her in this particular. That is just how we treat Ibsen. We tell each other with great freedom that there is nobody in the world who cannot be done without, and that there are as good fish in the sea as ever came out of it. We even go so far as to say—in French—that in the dark all cats are grey. But we hold that a man should never admit that the world contains more than one possible woman for him—surely a most dismally idiotic doctrine. So when John Gabriel Borkman delivers himself as above, we cry "Shame!" and console ourselves with the faithfulness of Ella Rentheim, the adorable old maid at whose expense John Gabriel has acted on his more catholic view to the extent of jilting her, on pecuniary consideration, for her twin sister. Even this consolation is a stolen one; for Ibsen remorselessly makes Ella say, when she is complimented on her power of love: "Perhaps it is the lack of love that keeps that power alive," meaning that her infatuation has persisted solely because it has never been gratified. That is the root objection to Ibsen's people: they will not keep up appearances. They come out with our guiltiest secrets so coolly that we feel that if there were such a thing as a hospital for ailing doctors, and a layman were put into a bed there by mistake, the illusionless conversation in the wards might make him feel as we feel when the old people in Ibsen, long finished with chivalry and sentiment, tell each other the frozen truth about their symptoms.

The fact is, enjoyment of Ibsen is a question of strength of mind. The quantity of truth the average man can bear is still very small; and every increase of the dose is met by piteous protests and cries of "Pessimist," "Cynic," "Morbid," and the like. Our own dramatists, in the presence of their sovereign tyrant, the public, are, more or less, like the preacher who, having rashly said in the presence of Louis XIV., "We are all mortal," suddenly caught the monarch's eye and added, "At least, nearly all." But the preacher's slip was a very venial one; for there are ten thousand men who can look death in the face for every one who can look life in it. Louis, who no doubt laughed at the courtly preacher, would certainly have had Ibsen broken on the wheel, as a good many excellent people would nowadays if they had the power. To endure the pain of living, we all drug ourselves more or less with gin, with literature, with superstitions, with romance, with idealism, political, sentimental, and moral, with every possible preparation of that universal hashish—imagination. Properly speaking, the opposition to the Awakener is nothing but the natural resistance of the average man to having his standard of temperance and fortitude screwed up to that of the man of genius. This is the whole secret of the eternal war between genius and mediocrity. It has never raged so incessantly as in the present century, because never before have such vast masses of untrained readers been let loose on literature by elementary education and cheap books. It is true that the public relishes a little bitterness in literature as well as in beer. Sentimental or satirical pessimism—the tragic or comic contrast of the frailty of man or the cruelty of Nature with the sublimity of the ideal—is by no means unpopular: in fact, pessimistic sublimity is the characteristic key of the whole romantic-commercial school, from the Renaissance onward. Though Swift, having omitted the indispensable feminine interest, may be found too savage, Shakespeare, La Rochefoucauld, and Thackeray are highly appreciated, whilst the most fashionable book in the Bible is Ecclesiastes. But the genuine realist, the man who exalts, not the ideal at the expense of life, but life at the expense of the ideal, can only hold the public like a bulldog. Look at the portraits of William Blake, the author of Proverbs of Hell, and of Ibsen! What bulldog ever developed such grip and tenacity in the mouth? One understands at a glance the remark which has been made about Ibsen—"No man has any right to have such a mouth." But no less a mouth is needed to carry such a forehead through the idealist wilderness of this world.

Here are a few samples from the new play. Borkman, an old Napoleon of commerce, who, by ill-luck in his first battle, missed his millions and landed himself in prison, is talking to Foldal, an old clerk, whom he has ruined. Foldal, imagining himself a poet, clings to Borkman as the only man who admires his unperformed tragedy. In return, he believes that Borkman's dreams of rehabilitation and success will come true. Ibsen makes short work of the pretty picture of humble devotion faithful to fallen greatness. The course of their mutual admiration is disturbed by a dispute about women.

"BORKMAN (indignantly): O, these women! They wreck and ruin life for us. Play the devil with our whole destiny—our triumphal progress.

"FOLDAL: Not all of them!

"BORKMAN: Indeed? Can you tell me of a single one that's good for anything?

"FOLDAL: No; that's the trouble. The few that I know are good for nothing.

"BORKMAN (with a snort of scorn): Well, then, what's the good of it? What's the good of such women existing if you never know them?

"FOLDAL (warmly): Yes, John Gabriel, there is good in it, I assure you. It's such a blessed, beneficent thought that here or there in the world—somewhere—far away—the true woman exists after all!"

This, it will be observed, is poor old Foldal's form of hashish—the imaginary true woman, his consoler for the contempt of his wife, who gives no quarter to his poetic hashish and his worthless tragedies. The conversation presently leads Foldal to betray that his belief in Borkman's rehabilitation is only a pretence. Instantly he is smitten with the terrible retort, "You are no poet." Then all the fat is in the fire.

"BORKMAN: Here you've been lying to me all the time.

"FOLDAL: It wasn't a lie so long as you believed in my vocation. So long as you believed in me, I believed in you.

"BORKMAN: Then we've been all the time deceiving each other. And perhaps deceiving ourselves—both of us.

"FOLDAL: But isn't that just the essence of friendship, John Gabriel?"

And so they part for ever—"for ever" meaning, needless to add, an hour or so.

The idealists will, of course, take all this iconoclasm as mere satire—Thersites up to date. It is not so: it is sympathy and honesty. The proof is in the result. Compare poor Foldal with any attempt in fiction to get sympathy for an old clerk by the ordinary idealist method of painting out all the selfish spots in him—Chuffy in Martin Chuzzlewit, for example. You may wince at every step in Ibsen's process, and snivel with tearful satisfaction at every step in Dickens's; but the upshot is that you are left with a serious belief in and regard for Foldal, whereas Chuffy is nothing but a silly and rather tiresome toy. When Dickens himself, later on, became a serious master of his art, his progress was on the road that leads away from Chuffy and towards Foldal—that is, from sentimental, cowardly, sweet-toothed lying to sympathetic, courageous, nutritious truth.

It is impossible within the limits of a single article to combine a description of the literary and dramatic contents of a play of Ibsen's with its constitutional criticism, so to speak. Nor are such descriptions to the point now that Mr. William Archer's translation has placed the text in the hands of all for whom a criticism of Ibsen has any interest. It is sufficient to note that besides the two old men, there are two old women—twin sisters—the married one satisfied and pitiless in her affections, the old maid tender and remorseful, indignant only because she has been cheated, not of a mother's joy and happiness, but of a mother's sorrows and tears, the loss of which moves her to cry out to Borkman, "You are a murderer. You have committed the one mortal sin." In bright relief against this regret is the younger Borkman's impulse towards happiness and "living his own life," and his youthful revolt, in full illusion as to the boundlessness of his choice, against the apparent selfishness with which his elders have disposed of his career. The whole play is a wonderful chapter on the illusions of youth and the illusions of age—a wise and powerful work, which will purify and strengthen dramatic literature, and help to educate dramatic criticism, very much against their own wills no doubt, but all the more effectually on that account.

One of our best dramatic critics, Mr. A. B. Walkley, has pointed out the happy chance by which this play exactly fits the Lyceum company. But Sir Henry Irving's insensibility to Ibsen is notorious: there is no chance, unfortunately, of the hint being taken. Yet it is difficult to believe, especially after the success of the long-delayed "Little Eyolf," that "John Gabriel Borkman" will have to wait and beg for two years as "Little Eyolf" waited and begged. Who speaks first?

GEORGE BERNARD SHAW.

THE TRUTH ABOUT SAKHALIN.

The New Siberia: being an Account of a Visit to the Penal Island of Sakhalin, &c. By Harry de Windt, F.R.G.S. (Chapman & Hall.)

[The review that follows is from the pen of a Russian gentleman, whose position and special knowledge of the question entitle him to speak with authority on the penal settlement of Sakhalin.]

"I HAVE endeavoured . . . to avoid," says Mr. de Windt in his preface, "any reference to Government statistics." This he did in order not "to weary the reader." Thus, from fear of wearying, he draws his conclusions without any substantial support from facts, and, as we shall see later on, quite erroneously. "Questions of special interest connected with the Russian exile system," continues the author, "will be found in the appendices." What are these questions? In his appendices Mr. de Windt gives a sectional drawing of the steamer Yaroslav, his own letter to the editor of the Standard, a play-bill of the theatrical performance given by convicts at Alexandrovsky-Post, a list of post-stations between Vladivostok and Nicolaevsk, and the like. We must confess that we cannot understand what connexion there is between the exile system and theatrical play-bills and the names of the stations. Nevertheless, this is the whole supply of authoritative facts or statements the author offers. In the whole book you cannot find one single quotation from or reference to the special literature of the question which is so abundant. Is not this, perhaps, because the author did not want to refer to the "usual fables," to use his own expression, which are circulated abroad? But no, the Russian official literature (Mr. de Windt, according to his own statement, knows Russian) contains excellent works on Sakhalin and on Russian exile which may be quoted without any fear of making a mistake. Nevertheless, Mr. de Windt does not make use of them. This perhaps is the reason why nearly every page of Mr. de Windt's book contains statements altogether incomprehensible as made by a man who has any knowledge of Russian life, even though not a thorough knowledge.

We are told that women in Russia are allowed to attend university lectures, that capital punishment only exists for regicides, that persons convicted of forgery are sent to the mines on the Sakhalin island (as a matter of fact, the severest punishment for forgery is the deprivation of rights and exile to Siberia not farther east than the Yenisei province). But all these errors are mere trifles when compared with his descriptions of the island of Sakhalin. According to Mr. de Windt, the convicts on that island enjoy full happiness. He cannot find words sufficient to praise the Sakhalin prisons, and especially the convict settlements, "the spotless plank floor, the bright copper pans and snowy window-curtains" which he saw in their coquettish, pretty cottages (p. 70). All convicts earn excellent wages as servants, yet, says the author, "the majority prefer to take advantage of the grant of land . . . and earn a living by the production of cereal or vegetable produce" (p. 60). Agriculture is most advantageous, and, generally speaking, according to Mr. de Windt, "the privileges of a . . . convict on Sakhalin are great": so much so, indeed, that a friend of Mr. de Windt's, whose words he quotes, says "the authorities erred, if anything, on the side of leniency" (p. 75).

Let us turn to facts. I will quote only from such sources as are not in dispute and have appeared in Russia. First of all as regards climate. M. Polyakov, a member of the Russian Imperial Geographical Society, found eternal ice as the subsoil of even the southern part of the island. Winter lasts from September to May, but the summer, even in the southern part of the island, is not exempt from occasional icy mists and frosts. "On July 24, a frost occurred in Derbinskoye which destroyed the whole crop of potatoes" (the Russian monthly, Russian Thought, February, 1894, p. 43). Eighty-eight versts from Korsakovsky-Post (in the south) the captain of the clipper Vsadnik registered on the morning of May 23 a temperature of two degrees below zero Réaumur. From these instances the reader may get a hint of what agriculture must be like in such a climate; but here is what Dr. Chekhov, who investigated the island only a short time before Mr. de Windt, wrote on the dictation of the local governor-general: "The agricultural settlements of the convicts on the island of Sakhalin are an impossibility. The people must be provided with work" (ibid., p. 4). If on the Sakhalin island the tillage of the soil is attended to, "the seed used is every time obtained from the government as a loan" (Chekhov). The grain obtained from local crops, if any, cannot be used as seed as it is invariably damaged by frost. The best crop is three bushels for one. The local officials are simply cheating the controllers, showing them grain obtained from Japan as that grown on Sakhalin. And here is the description of the settlers' cottages. It has little in common with the idyll pictured by Mr. de Windt. "The poverty is really crying . . . the inhabitants are a miserable crowd of Russians, Poles, Finns, Georgians, all hungry and in rags, herded together against their own will and by mere chance, as though after a shipwreck" (Chekhov's The Island of Sakhalin). "The question as to the means of subsistence of the population of the Alexandrovsky-Post is for me still one on which I cannot decide," says the Russian traveller; "about half of that population receives a governmental allowance in the form of a prisoner's payok (the daily rations of food)" (Russian Thought, November, 1893, p. 158). Now, about the earnings of the convicts. Mr. de Windt is quite right in saying that about half of them are serving as cooks or lackeys of the officials, but he forgets to add that all this labour is unpaid, it is compulsory slave labour. "The officials," says Dr. Chekhov, "take seven, eight, and more unpaid servants." I have already mentioned Mr. de Windt's friend who charges the administration of Sakhalin with leniency. This opinion is shared by Mr. de Windt, yet, on the very cover of his book, we find a picture of the revolting and horrible plot (three-thonged whip weighing eight pounds), six strokes of which are sometimes enough to kill a man, while the prisoners are sometimes sentenced to ninety strokes. The prisons of Sakhalin are provided with absolutely dark penitentiary cells, in three of which Mr. de Windt himself saw prisoners who had spent three years each in them—one of them went mad! Let us turn to facts which cannot be denied. The convicts of the Korsakov-Post uncover their heads at fifty paces distance from everybody who is not a convict. They took to this custom because originally they were cruelly beaten if they were too slow and uncovered their heads at only thirty paces distant (Chekhov). "It happens that fifty men are flogged wholesale" (Russian Thought, March, 1894, p. 9). The following facts may also tell something about leniency.

"The Derbinsky settlement was founded in commemoration of the prison warden Derbin, who was killed by the prisoners for his cruelty." "The prison warden Selinov. . . was killed by the prisoners for his cruelty." "The warden of the Rikov prison, M. Livin, a man of ability with a spirit of initiative . . . unfortunately has a great inclination to use the rod, which has already led once to an attempt being made on his life" (Chekhov's The Island of Sakhalin).

How far the personality of a human being is taken into consideration on Sakhalin may be guessed from the fact that the convict women are "distributed" like cattle. The prettiest of them are "taken to their harems" by the officials, wardens, and clerks (Russian Thought, June, 1894, p. 4 c). All the rest are distributed among the convicts, "of whom only those who are well-to-do and have influential friends get women" (Ibid. p. 8). The women must reconcile themselves with being treated like dumb slaves; the slightest protest brings about a severe punishment.

"The convict woman Yaguel'skaya was punished with thirty strokes of the rod for having left the man to whom she was given, the convict Kotlyarov. . . . The convict Yarovsky lodged a complaint with the authorities that the woman given him declines to keep him company. This led to the decision, Give her seventy (rods)" (Ibid., p. 7, footnote).

These horrible facts, made public in the Russian Censured Press, have been altogether overlooked by Mr. de Windt. To compensate for the omission, he gives full particulars of the toilet of those ladies whom he met at the rooms of the prison wardens. The remainder of the information given by Mr. de Windt is as inaccurate. "The school founded for children of prisoners by Mme. Pobedonostzev is . . . in every way admirably conducted," says he (p. 67). Here are the real facts: "The Sakhalin schools are poor, their resources are beggarly, their existence is a chance one . . . the teaching is conducted . . . by people who have absolutely no training" (Russian Thought, July, 1894, p. 29). Mr. de Windt speaks of the excellent and sufficient food in the prisons; in reality it is abominable, and "so insufficient that prisoners working on the sea-shore or close to some river do not despise those molluscs or fish left there at low tide." The mining-engineer, Keppen, states that those prisoners who worked under him took to eating tallow candles.

I could easily go on thus, through every page of Mr. de Windt's production. I hope, however, that what has been said is quite sufficient. I cannot understand one thing, and that is the courage with which Mr. de Windt jeers so roughly and rudely at all those Englishmen who have written on Sakhalin before him, while his own book is an accumulation, to use the expression of Swift's virtuous Houyhnhnms, "of things which were not." I shall not touch here Mr. de Windt's altogether fantastic information about Akatouy. This information is as though specially written for readers who cannot read "A Convict's Memoirs," by Mr. Melshin, which has just appeared in the Russian monthly Russian Wealth, which is under preventive censorship. England is evidently much interested in the question of the Russian exile system and practice. It is a pity that no translator seems to think it worth while to make use of the official and other unquestionable Russian sources on the subject. Then the publication of fantastic works of the type of Mr. de Windt's book would be made impossible.

THE WORKS OF PROF. ADAMS.

The Scientific Papers of John Couch Adams, F.R.S. Vol. I. Edited by William Grylls Adams, F.R.S. With a Memoir by J. W. L. Glaisher, F.R.S. (Cambridge: University Press.)

THIS publication, of which the massive tome before us constitutes a first instalment, will form a monument, aere perennius, to the memory of the greatest of English mathematical astronomers since Newton. Besides the sixty-two papers here collected from various scientific repositories, the late Lowndean professor left a goodly accumulation of MSS. Few, or none of them, are complete works; but most appear to be capable of completion, and all must bear the stamp of a powerful and capacious mind. Under the care of the author's brother, the present editor, and of Prof. Sampson, they will, in due time, and doubtless in the best possible shape, be presented to the learned world.

John Couch Adams was born June 5, 1819, and died January 21, 1892. Forty-six of these seventy-two years were devoted to meditation and calculation; for his leisure was only varied, not broken, by the fulfilment of the duties attached to his professorial chair. The choicest fruits of that leisure have unquestionably been already gathered; yet it is well that none should be lost, even such as have hung unripe on the tree during forty years. Dropping metaphor, we record the plain fact that Adams, like many other mathematicians of the highest order, was averse from publication. He aimed at ideal excellence; and, unless through the stress of some peremptory occasion, usually held back his work with the intention of making it more to his liking. Too often the "finishing touches" which his sure instinct demanded were never given.

His principal performances, it need hardly be said, were in gravitational astronomy. He first attacked the "inverse problem of perturbations"; and he attacked it with such success that, but for official indifference, his intellectual discovery of the planet Neptune by means of its disturbing influence upon the movements of Uranus, would have led straightway to its optical detection. The memoir embodying this momentous investigation was the earliest, as well as the most brilliant, of Adams's productions. Deposited at the Royal Observatory October 21, 1845, it received curiously little attention; and its author was not the man to advertise his achievement. So the prize was allowed to fall to his French competitor, Urban Jean Joseph Leverrier, who had started later along the same track. Amid the din of recrimination which followed, Adams preserved an admirable silence. The life-long secret of his disappointment went with him to the grave. His relations with Leverrier were of uniform cordiality.

His contributions to the lunar theory, although less exceptional in their nature than his analytical disclosure of Neptune, were of primary importance. And round and about them, too, controversies long and hot were raised. Hansen and Plana, noted specialists in that line, regarded the upshot of his inquiries as inconsistent with what they, by a strange confusion of thought, took to be facts; Pontécoulant resented it as derogatory to Laplace to apply a correction to that illustrious, but not infallible, geometer's results. After waiting some years for the withdrawal of obviously futile objections, Adams answered them, once for all, in 1860. He did so with some mild expression of surprise that it should have been necessary. The question at issue, a strictly mathematical one, related to the acceleration of the moon's motion. To what extent, Adams inquired, could it be accounted for by the diminution in the eccentricity of the earth's orbit known to be in progress? The solution was effected "by means of a purely algebraical process, the validity of each step of which admitted of being placed beyond all possible doubt." It showed that, not the whole, as Laplace had believed, but only a part of the acceleration deduced from ancient eclipse-records could thus be accounted for. The conclusion was so solidly established that time has left it unmodified; while the outstanding hurry of the moon's pace has dwindled almost to nothing under Prof. Newcomb's keen scrutiny.

Adams was elected President of the Royal Astronomical Society in 1851, and again in 1874. The addresses delivered by him in that capacity, here reprinted, are masterly compositions, testifying to the wide scope of his astronomical interests. It devolved upon him, in 1876, to present the society's gold medal to Leverrier for his herculean investigations of planetary theories. To a smaller man the occasion might have been painful or embarrassing; to him it was one of "great satisfaction." The conjuncture was typical. The names of Adams and Leverrier are bracketed on the roll of fame.

The case of Neptune was not the only one in which they performed a novel and arduous task in duplicate. Stimulated by the meteoric display of November 13, 1866, both undertook the calculation of the orbit of the swarm of "Leonids" encountered that night by the earth. Leverrier's result was laid before the Paris Academy of Sciences, January 21, 1867; Adams's wholly independent, but confirmatory, research two months later. This discounting of his bill upon futurity did not, however, ruffle his equanimity. Few have cared less for personal renown. "A place in Westminster Abbey" made no part of his ambition. It is to our national credit, however, that he is commemorated there, in a medallion carved by Mr. Bruce Joy, and fitly placed close to the grave of Newton.

OSSIAN.

The Poems of Ossian. Translated by James Macpherson. With Notes and an Introduction by William Sharp. (Patrick Geddes & Colleagues.)

It was no untimely thought to reprint for the benefit of a new generation the so-called Poems of Ossian in this comely form. Not that there is any particular virtue in the centenary of James Macpherson's death, which the issue professedly celebrates. Whatever the true story of the poems may be, it is clear that Macpherson did not play a very exalted part in it; and the real importance of these pseudo-epics of Fingal and Temora lies in the fact that, sophisticated and made into pinchbeck by eighteenth-century taste as they are, they are yet a landmark of that rising flood of imaginative feeling which has done so much during the last hundred years to re-create and revivify English letters. The manes of Bishop Percy and Chatterton and James Macpherson do not stretch out the cleanest of hands to us from that other shore, but at least they may claim that they led forth the people in their day to drink once again of the perennial waters of romance. Nor is it unnatural that the pioneers of the present renewed interest in things Celtic should recur with deference to that kindred spirit of a century ago. And another excellent reason for the new reprint may be found in the fact that the echoes of an ancient feud have at last ceased to reverberate around the shade of Ossian. Probably no one still believes that the poems ascribed to the Fenian bard really date back, as they now stand, to any hoary antiquity: and probably no one still accepts the blustering dismissal of the whole of them by Dr. Johnson as nothing more than an impudent forgery of Macpherson's own. Johnson's literary dictatorship is not, one fears, what it was. And a decade of competent scholarship has come to the saner conclusion, that while Macpherson is doubtless responsible for the form in which the poems are now found, yet he was drawing upon a stock of traditional material, which contained fragments from at least two cycles of primitive Celtic song. All the difficulties connected with the question are not yet cleared up. It remains uncertain whether the Gaelic version of 1807 was, as it professed to be, the original of, or merely a translation from, the English version of 1760; and it would appear that in any case Macpherson must have had access to documents which have not been handed down to us. But that the substance of the tales was not invented in the eighteenth century is quite certain. They can be traced ages before that, and have their roots deep in Celtic legend.

One regrets that so welcome a reprint should be marred by the introduction. It would not have been a task of insuperable difficulty, even within the allotted space, to put the main outlines of the Ossianic controversy and the main conclusions arrived at clearly and concisely before the reader. First-hand knowledge was not called for. But Mr. William Sharp's introduction puts nothing clearly and concisely. It is only a jumble of jottings from the last half-dozen books on the subject. Mr. Sharp takes the views of Mr. Nutt and Prof. Zimmer and Prof. Curry and Dr. Douglas Hyde and others, and of each in turn he gives a scrappy and incoherent résumé. He makes no attempt to weave his gatherings into an orderly and intelligible statement: they remain a rudis indigestaque moles. One point after another is raised, imperfectly handled, and dropped again; nor from beginning to end is any plain issue presented to us. In fact, if we had no other source of information than Mr. Sharp, we doubt whether we should ever discover what the Ossianic problem really is. The introduction is disfigured with egregious misprints, some of which are corrected in a list of Errata, while others, such as Hocales for Hercules, are not. The publishers state that, "this introduction had to be printed during the author's absence in America, and . . . he saw no proofs." They appear to look upon this as an extenuation; to us it seems an aggravation of the offence.

ADVOCATUS DIABOLI.

Evil and Evolution. By the Author of "The Social Horizon." (Macmillan & Co.)

THERE are certain questions against which people will insist on running their heads, even with the certainty of cracking their skulls. To the end of days men will be found trying to solve the problem of perpetual motion which is demonstrably insoluble; to square the circle, though the circle and the square are incommensurable; and to set forth the origin of evil, though the human intellect, being what it is, is incapable of apprehending the origin of anything. The latest expedition into the mysterious regions which lie at the back of Creation is conducted by the author of Evil and Evolution, and is professedly "an attempt to turn the light of modern science on to the ancient mystery of evil." The writer looks about him upon the world, and finds that it is very bad. It occurs to him that the existence of sin and suffering is not to be reconciled with the assumption of a Creator who is at once omnipotent, omniscient, and beneficent. And his reasoning leads him by a straight and easy path to the discovery which he announces in his book. It is the devil who is at the bottom of it all.

It must be confessed that the devil has been somewhat unceremoniously treated in these latter days. Science deals only with phenomena, and that which we call evil—that is to say, that which makes us physically, morally, or intellectually uncomfortable—no more requires explanation than that which we call good. Even among religious people the personality of the devil has receded into the background. As a personality he has been slain by ridicule. His appearances, for example, to St. Dunstan and to Martin Luther were not calculated to increase the respect felt for him; and in the miracle plays of the Middle Ages it was the fashion to present him as a malignant buffoon who was driven off the stage with hisses and laughter. Until the author of Evil and Evolution took up his pen it is to be feared that the devil survived only as a popular expletive.

His reasoning is of childlike simplicity. He takes his place by the side of the Creator in the act of creation, as He is "pondering the idea of a universe" and "elaborating its details." If the Creator were beneficent and all-powerful, He would have made a happy world. But manifestly He did not. And here comes our author's triumph. There must have been another power at hand. Our author sees that the universe is a very complicated affair, a scheme "of the most exquisite delicacy of balance and adjustment." He proceeds:

"You have only to assume that, while such a system of things was being planned and evolved, a being such as I have endeavoured to depict was looking on, and, in a certain sense at least, it is easy to conceive of what may have taken place."

What appears to have taken place was that the devil managed to upset the balance in one or two particulars. And that is the origin of evil.

Our author is, we are sure, quite unconscious of his irreverence and his absurdity. But undoubtedly his conception of an Omniscient Being, to whom space and time are as nought, laboriously planning a universe in ignorance of the presence of a power that will ruin his work, is both a little irreverent and exceedingly absurd. With the instinct of the child and the savage, he assumes that the chair which falls upon him, and the lightning which terrifies him, must be the direct outcome of some malignant personality. But he does not see that even when he has concluded that evil must be the work of an evil person, he has only pushed the difficulty one step further back. We have still to discover the origin of the evil person.

TOCQUEVILLE'S RECOLLECTIONS.

The Recollections of Alexis de Tocqueville. Edited by the Comte de Tocqueville, and now first translated into English by Alexander Teixeira de Mattos. With a Portrait in Heliogravure. (H. Henry & Co.)

THE title of this work is somewhat misleading. One expects to find an illustrious man's recollections of his lifetime. Tocqueville was born in 1805, and died in 1859. Of high rank, a brilliant writer, and a conspicuous actor in the social and political life of his country, he could have told us a story we should have delighted to hear; but, at p. 4, we meet with this announcement: "I intend that my recollections shall not go farther back than the Revolution of 1848, nor extend to a later date than October 30, 1849, the day upon which I resigned my office"—the Foreign Office. The period is brief, but it is crammed with interesting events. Tocqueville, however, paints for us only so much of it as he "with his own eye saw." Hence his book is in the nature of an impression, necessarily a fragmentary impression, often a somewhat confused impression, seldom, for the casual reader, an especially fascinating impression. What its value as a document may be to the historian we cannot judge. The casual reader, we fear, will pronounce it disappointing and a trifle dull. Of the aspect of Paris during the émeutes of February we get but the obscurest notion; indeed, were it not that one has read such endless chapters about these same émeutes before, one might get no notion at all. What Tocqueville evokes, therefore, is not a vision, but a memory. We remember, among other things, our Education Sentimentale, and the intense "realising sense" Flaubert there conveys to us of the look of the Paris streets, the temper of the Parisians, on the troublous 24th. But then, as Tocqueville mentions, he wrote these recollections "for himself alone." They are "not a picture painted for the public."

The most readable pages are those in which he sketches certain of his contemporaries; but here again he is sketching "for himself alone." He sketches sketchily, and his sketches lack the touches that give life. Louis-Philippe, Lamartine, Louis Blanc, Louis-Napoleon, are among the shadows that flit across his way: Louis-Philippe with his immense garrulity, Lamartine with his immense insincerity, Louis Blanc with his immense head, and Louis-Napoleon with his immense littleness. The two bits that seem to us most vivid are his meeting with George Sand, and the death of Chateaubriand. He met George Sand, for the first and only time, "at an Englishman's of my acquaintance, Milnes, a member of Parliament, who was then in Paris." Milnes had not yet become Lord Houghton. "He was a clever fellow," Tocqueville assures us. Against Mme. Sand

"I was strongly prejudiced. . . . Nevertheless, she pleased me. . . . I thought her features rather massive, but her expression admirable: all her mind seemed to have taken refuge in her eyes, abandoning the rest of her face to matter. . . . She had a real simplicity of manner and language, which she mingled, perhaps, with some little affectation of simplicity in her dress."

When Chateaubriand, who "had long since fallen into a sort of speechless stupor," was told that Louis-Philippe's government had fallen, he raised himself to say, "Well done."

"Four months later, the din of the days of June reached his ears, and he asked what that noise was. They answered that people were fighting in Paris, and that it was the sound of cannon. Thereupon he made vain efforts to rise, saying, 'I want to go to it,' and was then silent, this time for ever; for he died the next day."

A NEW LIFE OF BURTON.

The True Life of Captain Sir R. F. Burton, K.C.M.G. By his Niece, Georgiana Stisted. (H. S. Nichols.)

MISS STISTED has written a better Life of Burton than that by his devoted wife. The literary quality in the book is excellent if it comes from an unpractised hand. Some of Burton's fervour and picturesqueness of diction have fallen to his niece. The story of Burton's boyhood and youth, full of madcap escapades, carries you on in rapt enjoyment. He was a wild Irishman, if ever there was one, though the residence and birth of a couple of generations of Burtons in Ireland need not necessarily have brought about this result. Miss Stisted, for example, seems to have inherited no more Irishism than the extreme bitterness of the Irish Low Church man and especially woman—a bitterness which, perhaps, compares with nothing this side of the Channel. In Ireland the bitterness is not only religious, it is racial and social as well; and the absolute disassociation of some Irish Protestants from all that surrounds them—the haughtiness, the misprision towards the great mass of their fellow countrymen—must be known in order to be believed. Burton, however, was pure Irish by temperament, and by accident or by design his growth seems to have been surrounded by Irish influences. His first schoolmaster was Irish, the groom who instructed him in boxing, the jockey on whose account he was sent down from Oxford, the friend who performed the delightfully madcap feat of crossing the sacred tanks on the backs of the alligators—in fact, the Irishry come up at every other page. During the residence of his family at Sorrento, Richard, then a boy, performed three feats which stand out of his escapades: he crossed the Natural Arch because an Italian told him it was impossible; he took the dog's place in the Grotto del Cane, and was nearly asphyxiated before he could be pulled out; and he attempted to descend into the crater of Vesuvius because the country people told him that the devil had disappeared over the verge. A harassing boy to his parents, truly. Miss Stisted knows the Eastern life thoroughly, and is able to reproduce it for us with photographic detail, and a colour not at all photographic. She makes us see a place in a flash—for instance, Ghára:

"A melancholy village . . . dirty heaps of mud-and-mat hovels close to a salt-water creek, bone-dry in March, a waste of salt flat, barren rock, and sandy plains, where eternal sea-gales blow up and blow down a succession of hillocks, warts on the foul face of a hideous landscape."

To Burton's varied life, full of colour and incident, splendid with adventure and almost unequalled in a monumental patience and industry, Miss Stisted does full justice. Burton is her hero, as he was his wife's. Unfortunately a fine book is spoilt by the virulence manifested against the late Lady Burton—and not only this, but by the coarse insults which Miss Stisted never fails to level against any religion but her own. The brandy-drinking nuns of Goa, "more like Gujarat apes than mortal women," is a specimen of Miss Stisted's extraordinary mind, and a hundred such passages make the book distasteful. Her charges against Lady Burton may or may not be true. The dead woman cannot answer them; and there is no excuse for the spitefulness which marks every allusion to Lady Burton in the book. It is not in such a temper that biography should be written. Violence and virulence take from the value of Miss Stisted's work, though they enhance its interest to a student of character. Perhaps this sentence makes it easier to understand her:

"It is a common saying in the family," she writes, "that Burtons understand only each other; and while this peculiarity has drawbacks as regards their friendships and marriages, it makes them very happy and united at home."

"Gey ill to live with" will be the verdict of the reader on some of the Burtons. It seems a thousand pities that Burton should be commemorated mistakenly by a squalid dispute over his grave, the more squalid because the person accused can never answer in this world. Temper, rash judgment, and bitter prejudice are sown broadcast in this otherwise excellent book.

ROBERT W. CHAMBERS.

AN APPRECIATION.

WHAT about Mr. Robert W. Chambers? Has he come, or is he still "a coming man"?

This Appreciation would have been written a few weeks ago but for the delay involved in waiting for the appearance of Mr. Chambers's new book, The Maker of Moons, and Other Tales.* I am sorry now that this short estimate did not appear earlier. In a word, Mr. Chambers seemed a brief while ago to be forging ahead rapidly and surely; since the publication of his fifth book I fear many of those who have watched his work with interest must endure a real disappointment.

The four books by which this author has been known hitherto are The King in Yellow, In the Quarter, The Red Republic, and A King and a Few Dukes. Of these, the first is much the most noteworthy, though the third is a powerful and moving romance of the

* The Maker of Moons. By Robert W. Chambers. (Putnam's.)

Paris Commune of 1871. In the second, we have a light, pleasantly told story of artist-life in the Quartier Latin: charmingly written, in fact, but without that distinction of individuality which could make a narrative in this familiar genre stand out from its fellows. When A King and a Few Dukes appeared, the American Press in general hailed the author as a new humorist, and as a master of a fresh and delightful style. The book certainly is amusing, and the fantastically extravagant narrative proceeds with unflagging verve, and, indeed, often with a charming suggestion of delicate style, if not style itself. But would Mr. Chambers have written it, have thought of it, if he had not read, let us say, Prince Otto and The Prisoner of Zenda? Along the Stevensonian road many feet have tramped; but where Mr. Anthony Hope has gone far Mr. Chambers has fared a brief way only, and rather obtrusively. It is to be feared that when the history of later Victorian fiction comes to be written there will be a large chapter headed "Stevenson first, and the rest nowhere." Perhaps one is a little prejudiced against A King and a Few Dukes by the declaration of the New York World that "it would be difficult to name in the whole range of English fiction a more charming, wholly delightful story"; while the New York Times, more enigmatically, states, "No superior fiction has appeared in months." "The whole range of English fiction," &c. These be large orders. The book is an amusing and well-written extravaganza, with scenes where the fantastical element is so delicately exposed as to recall the charming sidelong imaginings and deft craft of the author of the New Arabian Nights. To say this is to say a good deal. To advance the New York World claim is heavily to handicap a "coming man."

While it is true that it was by The King in Yellow Mr. Chambers won special attention on both sides of the Atlantic, that book is neither his most ambitious nor his best achievement. The Red Republic is the most vivid certainly, and I think the most enthralling narrative of the evil days of the Commune which any romancist has given us. In his winsome little Quartier-Latin story, In the Quarter, Mr. Chambers shows what may be called his spectacular familiarity with Paris and Paris life, but in his romance of the Commune he gives ample proof that he has studied the City of Revolutions and its firebrand populace with a thoroughness shown by few novelists who attempt to depict foreign life. So far as I have read in literature of this kind, I know only two romances of outstanding merit: The Red Republic and The Reds of the Midi, the one dealing with the Commune of 1871, the other with the Revolution of '48, or, rather, with the revolutionary march of Marseilles upon Paris.

When The King in Yellow appeared, critics and readers were puzzled. Here was a new writer with an imagination in fantasy as strange and vivid as that of Stevenson in his New Arabian Nights, though more sombre in quality; so touched, indeed, with the contagion of horror akin to madness that one instinctively wondered if the author of "The Fall of the House of Usher" were reincarnate in this new disciple of "The Grotesque and the Arabesque."

In one of the tales in this strange book, a paragraph begins thus: "I belong to those children of an older and simpler generation, who do not love to seek for psychological subtleties in art." If Mr. Chambers were speaking in propria persona this would be a wild perversion of the truth. He is all for psychological subtleties, and the darker and deeper and more uncanny and perturbing the better is he pleased. The King in Yellow is not to be recommended to readers of a natively morbid turn. The whole book, or the dominant portion of it, might well be the literary recreation of a man whose uncontrolled imagination had landed him in an asylum; and it is the best proof of Mr. Chambers's "psychological subtlety" that he can turn from these studies of wildly fantastic mental obsession to work so sane and virile as his Red Republic or In the Quarter. This strange little volume, however, would be much more impressive were it shorn of "The Street of the Four Winds" and its companion stories; not because these are poor, for they are among Mr. Chambers's best work, but because they do not cohere with the haunting, the painfully fascinating tales dominated by the subtle conception of "The King in Yellow." Who is the King in Yellow? That mystery is never explained, though the reader infers him to be Death incarnate. But the words which come to have so terrifying a significance indicate not a personality but a book. "The King in Yellow" so frequently alluded to in Mr. Chambers's volume of the same name is a mysterious book. It is the very quintessence of evil, of moral and mental corruption. From its pages the spiritual tyranny of hell is exhaled. Despair, madness, and death lie in wait for those who read them. In his veiled allusions to this terrible work Mr. Chambers betrays imagination of a remarkable kind, an imagination coloured by sombre poetry. One begins, soon or late, to believe in this accursed book, whose influence is so widespread and disastrous. It is as though Baudelaire and Maldoror had combined, with subtle art, to make abstract evil actual; though a Power infinitely more potent than the author of Les Fleurs du Mal or Les Chants de Maldoror, the Supreme Evil himself, fashioned this impossible book, this bible of corruption and the grave. Even as the fantastic background of The House of Usher has, for many readers, a convincing actuality, or as the shadow-haunted valleys of Ulalume are as real as other vales on the hither verge of dreamland, so is Carcosa credible—Carcosa, the mysterious land where Hastur and the Hyades, the Lake of Hali, the Black Stars, the tattered King in Yellow, the Pallid Mask, the Yellow Sign, are names of indefinable terror.

In The King in Yellow the three most distinctive stories are those which, collectively, might bear that title: "The Repairer of Reputations," "The Court of the Dragon," and "The Yellow Sign." The first is the most remarkable. To use a commonplace, no one who has read this wild fantasy is likely ever to forget it. True, it is, after all, merely the uncontrolled imagining of a madman, one Hildred Castaigne; but there is method with a vengeance. "The Repairer of Reputations" is, in its opening pages as in its title, eminently Stevensonian. Later, as also in The Yellow Sign, one is reminded more of Poe in his most morbid tales of horror. In one and all, however, Mr. Chambers is no imitator. Here he is akin to the two great writers alluded to, and not merely a self-trained follower.

As yet Mr. Chambers has done nothing to equal, much less to surpass, his first volume—if, as I understand, The King in Yellow is his first book. He has produced none so unsatisfactory as his Maker of Moons. There is in this certainly entertaining and occasionally convincingly able book little of the distinctive quality which pertains to his first. A cheaper, a vulgar note is struck again and again till it becomes insistent. The art is less subtle, less genuine, more arbitrary: the tricks of the craftsman are more obtrusive. Something of the same fantastic imagination as informs The King in Yellow characterises the exciting titular story, but there is (for one interested reader, at any rate) a fatal lack of verisimilitude. The best thing in this book seems to be "In the Name of the Most High," a powerfully realistic war episode, clearly inspired by Mr. Stephen Crane's Red Badge of Courage, or, if not, then singularly suggestive of Mr. Crane's method and manner. Perhaps the stories in The Maker of Moons are reprints of early experiments: one hopes so. But it is time for so promising, for so genuinely able and individual a writer, to be done with tentatives. Let Mr. Chambers eschew the extremes of fantasy; let him cease to emulate the example of Stevenson; let him subdue his ambition to out-Poe Poe. Then, if he will concentrate his forces and give us a book, whether fantastically real or actually real, he will, I am convinced, speedily be among the few who have honourably arrived.

WILLIAM SHARP.

FROM CROWDED SHELVES.

The Posthumous Papers of the Pickwick Club.
By Charles Dickens. In 2 vols. (Chapman & Hall.)

THIS, the very latest Pickwick, marks the beginning of the "Gadshill" edition of Dickens, which is to be completed in thirty-two volumes, under the editorship of Mr. Andrew Lang. The original illustrations will be reproduced, and the edition promises to be a handsome one. Our only complaint, indeed, is that Pickwick is not given in one volume. We expect Pickwick to be bulky, and where is the use of perfecting thin and light papers if they are not employed in simplifying the publisher's labours? Mr. Lang bids fair to be an agreeable editor. He approaches his task with a light heart, provides an introduction in his best manner, and appends as few notes as may be, instead of as many, and those pleasantly humorous in tone. Thus of the cricket match:

"Dickens knew nothing of cricket. One bowler cannot be chosen to bowl against Dumkins, while another 'is selected to do the same kind office for the hitherto unconquered Podder.' Podder could hardly be like that member of the M.C.C. in the Straits Settlements, about whom a friend wrote home: 'He has never been out since he came to the Colony.' . . . It is curious that a young man and a close observer like Dickens had so entirely failed to observe Miss Mitford's favourite game."

Of Mr. Pickwick himself Mr. Lane writes with admiration and affection:

"The great man," he says, "is a study of the humours of mastership and discipline. He reminds us now of Socrates, now of Dr. Johnson (who at one time, like Socrates, could take his liquor like a hero); now, if one may say so, of the late Master of Balliol."

A comparison of the times of Mr. Pickwick with those of the modern reader then follows, and Mr. Lang pours some rather nice contempt upon those among us who "can't read Dickens." The "Gadshill" edition should pass into the libraries of all members of the other and better camp.

Belinda. By Maria Edgeworth. (Macmillans.)

"Belinda," says Mrs. Ritchie in her introduction to this reprint, "was included in this edition after some deliberation, not because it is the best of Miss Edgeworth's stories, but because it is certainly one of the best known." It seems to us that if Belinda had been one of the least known it ought still to have its place, so entertaining, so vivacious are its pages. It may not be Miss Edgeworth's finest complete work, but much of her finest work is between its covers. Few of our present-day novelists, at any rate, can offer anything as attractive as this busy, copious book. Miss Edgeworth herself disliked her heroine: "I really was so provoked with the cold tameness of that stick or stone Belinda"—so she wrote to Mrs. Barbauld—"that I could have torn the pages to pieces"; and yet one may agree with the author and still delight in the story. Heroines are not everything. The preposterous chapter called "The Serpentine River" can never lose its fascination.

Daphnis and Chloe. (H. S. Nichols). MR. H. S. NICHOLS'S "Fin de Siècle Library" has been so heralded by circulars that we look with unusual interest at the initial volume—a version in English of the Daphnis and Chloe of Longus. Certainly a vast deal of money and care has been expended on the publication, and by a certain class of reader the book will be found alluring; but to ourselves it is merely wearisome. Daphnis and Chloe when translated into not too distinguished English is without charm, and the pictures—by no great master, Raphael Collin, to wit—do not help matters. Had the translation been made by such a scholar and artist as the late Walter Pater, after the manner of "Cupid and Psyche" in Marius the Epicurean, we might write differently. The text before us, moreover, has been translated not from the original, but from the French of Amyot and Courrier, no translator's name is given, and the preface by Jules Claretie (which is largely occupied in praising the exquisite old French of Amyot!) has evidence of being written several years since. Hence we conclude the book to be a mere Anglicised (or possibly Americanised) version of a French edition, served up with the catch-title of fin de siècle for the benefit of the English amateur of these things. The following passage from M. Claretie's introduction has, even in English, a certain grace which makes it worth quoting:

"There has always been in the heart of man a vague regret for what is, perhaps, the one absolute truth of life—namely, the country, the whispering winds, the blessed liberty of rural existence. It is the instinctive longing to return to nature's state which the rural romance, and in poetry the pastorals, have treated. The fable of Antheas, who renewed his strength by touching the earth, is not so foolish. Man, that other Antheas, who, nowadays particularly, gives his muscles no rest while using, yes, overtaxing, his brain, has sometimes need, physically and intellectually, of breathing in the odour, the perfume, of the earth, his mother, his nurse. Hence the immortality of these exquisite works in which two young beings pass half nude, like Paul and Virginia, or in an Eden-like purity, like Daphnis and like Chloe, across a landscape luminous and balmy. Humanity once again finds itself, with its hopes or its regrets, in these youthful loves."

Wagner's Heroines. By Constance Maud. (Edward Arnold.)

THIS book is dedicated to "all children big and little" who liked Wagner's Heroes, the two last words being the title of a previous work by the same authoress. We have not read that book; but if the stories of the heroes were told in as simple and pleasant a manner as are those of the heroines, there are probably many "children" ready to accept the dedication. Quite apart, however, from any fame which the writer may have already acquired, a book such as the one under notice appeals to the ever increasing number of those who take interest in Wagner's music-dramas. The numbers who visit Bayreuth year after year, and the crowded concert halls when Wagner programmes are announced, testify to this growing popularity, in which no doubt fashion plays some part. In many operas of the old school, the story was of secondary account; in Wagner's works it is of prime import—nay, more, the text-books of the latter are based on old legends of great interest and deep meaning, and associated likewise with poems of the Middle Ages, which take high rank in the history of literature. They possess, therefore, attractions of their own, independently of the music. The three heroines whose stories are narrated in this volume are Brunhilda, Senta, and Isolde. Of the "gentle Elsa, the saintly Elisabeth, the storm-tossed Kundry, and Eva, the bewitching little friend of Hans Sachs," the good and evil fortunes have already formed part of Wagner's Heroes. And so here we naturally learn something also about Siegfried, the Dutchman, and Tristan. The language of Miss Maud is studiously simple, and, moreover, many of the conversations are actual translations from the poems. There is one word in the authoress's brief preface to which we would take exception. She speaks of Wagner's great "operas." That term might apply to The Flying Dutchman, but with its old associations it is quite unsuitable to such works as Tristan and the Ring.

A Sketch of the Natural History of Australia: with some Notes on Sport. By Frederick G. Aflalo. Illustrated. (Macmillans.)

AUSTRALIA is the China of the zoological world. By dint of a long isolation from civilising influences it has preserved almost intact a fauna and a flora similar to those which existed elsewhere in periods long since obliterated. The majority of Australian mammals are marsupials; the earliest mammals in Europe of which traces have been found belonged to the same order. Mr. Aflalo writes pleasantly and vigorously on this remarkable backwater of life, pointing out a number of popular errors which prevail, and giving the more striking characteristics of each of the none too numerous species. As his work makes no pretence to scientific importance, we shall not find fault with it for keeping in the broad descriptive path, which in nine out of ten cases of this kind leads to destruction, but in his case results in a trustworthy popular guide. Some defence is made for the method of classification, which does not seem to be at fault, though an author might well be in some doubt when dealing with such elemental curiosities as the monotremes which lie at the very bottom of the mammalian scale, and are hardly qualified for admission to it. Such, for instance, is the duck-billed platypus, so grotesque a combination of bird, beaver, mole and fish, that the earlier naturalists declined to accept it as serious, and relegated it to the category of Buckland's "Mermaid." The stuffed specimens, however, give no adequate idea of the cryptic beauties of the platypus according to Mr. Aflalo, who has studied it in its native streams.

A Treatise on Ore Deposit. By J. Arthur Phillips. Rewritten and enlarged by Henry Louis. (Macmillans.)

THE first edition appeared in 1884, and it has been Mr. Louis's task to introduce such modifications in the work as the author himself might have done had he lived to see the extensive developments which his subject has undergone in the past twelve years. Mr. Louis, however, notes the fact that little original theoretical work has been done in this country. "It is," he says, "a curious reflection that the neglect of the scientific study of ore deposits should coincide with the marked decadence in their practical working which we have to deplore in this country, and it is a fair matter for surmise how far these two facts may have reacted on each other as cause and effect." Even the man in the street may well feel interested in the statement that our unrivalled mineral resources are not receiving such profound study as is given in America and Germany to their respective ore deposits. A work like this is the best ground for hope that this state of things will be altered for the better.

POETRY.

A PRUSSIAN PEASANT POET.

Poems by Johanna Ambrosius. Edited by Prof. Karl Schrattenthal. Translated by Mary J. Safford. (Roberts Bros.)

THE German professor who edits this book is a believer in the present as "a brilliant period of feminine literature"; and he cites in support of his contention the verses of Johanna Ambrosius. The women poets of Germany have already had in their roll a domestic servant, Katherine Koch; and this latest comer, for whom an English reputation is now sought, was born—in 1854—the daughter of a poor artisan, and is herself married to a peasant. When she was eleven she was taken from her little village school, and henceforth knew only toil in the household which had at its head an invalid mother. At the end of a day's spinning, when the appointed number of skeins was hung on the nail, Johanna would reach forth weary, and often bleeding, fingers to the source of all her joy—the cheap magazine. And when, not long ago, someone visited her as a woman of forty, and found her ill, lying with scarred hands idle on the cover of a poor bed in a snow-darkened cottage, he noticed near at hand a pencil and a copy of the Gartenlaube, the same magazine that had nourished her childhood. She had been faithful to her first love; her old paper was still her ideal; and other literature she had none. What joy must have been hers when its pages first printed one of her own sets of verses; though there were drawbacks no doubt, stupid misprints, more stupid editorial alterations—no need to recapitulate the common story of illusion. Similarly did Ada Negri in her remote Italian village feel the call in her newspaper, the newspaper to which she, too, sent her first verses and which gave her her first fame. The cheap periodical was the university and the court and the camp to these two maidens; there it was they learnt about poets, painters, musicians, statesmen, and kings. The editor was the Master of the Ceremonies who introduced these isolated women to a world which, in a measure, they were able to make their own. For Johanna Ambrosius was proud to read one day in Gartenlaube that the Empress, delighted with one of her poems, had taught it to her young princes at her knee—an incident which, in a country like Germany, partly explains why the volume of her poems edited by Prof. Schrattenthal should have gone already through twenty-six editions. "In Germany death is the poet's best letter of introduction"—her own case, at any rate, has belied one of her own sayings. What, then, is her title to distinction? From over two hundred pages we take three specimens of her verse where the translation is the happiest:

A SUMMER NIGHT.

"Her soft cool arms extending,
Night comes anew;
Fields, woods, and meadows clasping
Her heart unto;

"With mantle light enwrapping
Each tree and bush;
While murmuring tones the world
To dreams doth hush.

"The earth hath now forgotten Day's misery;
Mine eyes I lift in longing
Toward the sky.

"I see a wee bird soaring
In sunset's glow:
Ah, would my heart so weary
With it might go!"

It is the old stock-in-trade, after all; and that is disappointing. "Her only leisure time for writing is on Sunday," says the Professor. "And when does she compose? In the fields, in the garden, while cooking, in the stable." That seemed to promise newer things. Nor did her own account of herself lessen the expectation. "When I write a poem, I am so excited, so carried away from the world, that I seem a stranger to myself." It is when she is most "beside herself"—a phrase which means the opposite of what it says—that she comes nearest to the heart of the reader, and we do not deny that such verses as these are due to a real and genuine impulse:

AH, BIND MY HANDS.

"Ah, bind my outstretched hands, I pray,
With heavy fetters chaining,
Or they might else in my breast lay
A loved head, rest attaining.

"And wall up, too, this heart of mine,
In closest dungeon keeping;
Already through the windows shine
Love's bright flames upward leaping.

"Oh, make me deaf; oh, make me blind;
No glimpse of my receiving!
'Tis law for the forsaken child
To bear her sore heart's grieving."

The same sincerity, which even the most conventional vocabulary does not destroy, is shown in the last specimen we have chosen to represent her achievement at its best:

WEEP NOT, FOR I LOVE THEE.

"At dawn of every morning
The red sun smiles in glee,
The dewy earth consoling:
'Weep not, for I love thee.'

"The butterfly doth hover
The rose above, with plea
Of ardent love caressing:
'Weep not, for I love thee.'

"But thou and I, we only,
Lack courage to feel free;
We say not, save while dreaming:
'Weep not, for I love thee.'"

We omit a verse which is not good enough. Irrelevant and superfluous verses are frequent enough throughout the volume, a fault which we expect from a peasant poet, but which we might make a subject of some reproach against the Professor editor. Space fails for the expostulation; though not for a final word of praise for the zeal and discernment by which he has obtained not merely a national, but a European and a New World recognition for the talents of Johanna Ambrosius.

VARIOUS VERSES.

CHRISTIAN BURKE is a writer of pleasant magazine verses that have adorned the pages of the Argosy, of the Pall Mall Magazine, of Blackwood, of the Leisure Hour; and they are now gathered into a volume called The Flowering of the Almond Tree (W. Blackwood & Sons). The happiest of this writer's moods is that in which "Poet Leonard" is produced:

"Poet Leonard is so clever
He can hear the grass a-growing;
Knows the story of the river
Through the pleasant meadows flowing.
In his brown Franciscan habit,
Cropping tender, juicy grasses
At his ease, the nimble rabbit
Only nods when Leonard passes."

Also gathered from magazines and papers—from the Pall Mall Gazette which has published so much memorable verse, from Black and White, and from the Glasgow Herald, but greatly reinforced by new pieces, are the verses that make up the beautiful volume by Margaret T. Armour, entitled Songs of Love and Death (J. M. Dent). This lady does not put her best wares on the top; and those readers who are not deterred by the trivial treatment of "The Inner Shrine" will be rewarded, later on, by the two best verses in the book:

"IN ABSENCE.

"When shadows dim the meadow-gold,
And mignonette and musk
Perfume, through every scented fold,
The garments of the dusk;
When all the heavens are yearning to
The first faint silver star,
My spirit leans across to you,
Beloved, from afar.

"When courier wings begin to ride
The highways of the dawn,
And up the orient hills, in pride,
The car of day is drawn;
Even as the bridegroom Sol appears,
And earth's dismays are done;
O love, from out the dark and tears,
Arise and be my sun!"

Two volumes from Philadelphia allow us to welcome J. B. Lippincott Company to the small list of publishers who know how to produce a book of poetry; for nothing could be prettier in get-up than are Poems, by Robert Loveman, and An Autumn Singer, by Dr. George M. Gould. Of the two volumes, that by Mr. Loveman contains the most attracting verse. From the poem entitled "Purity" we take three verses:

"Whose mind is pure he is the man
For whom Almighty God doth plan;
For him in ecstasy the day
Doth blush itself in bliss away.

"Whose heart is pure, for him the night
Visions and dreams of rare delight;
For him, beyond the sunset's bars,
God sows the meadow-sky with stars.

"Whose soul is pure, for him the sea,
The mountain and its mystery;
For him, in all her shy retreats,
The tender heart of nature beats."

FICTION.

The Witch-Finder. By T. Pellatt. (Smith Elder & Co.)

THE date of this story is about 1638, and it concerns the fortunes of Francis Ewellme of Ewellme and his love, Sybil Gryce. Sybil is the true heir to the Ewellme estates, and much of the plot is taken up with the intrigues of two scoundrels to make profit for themselves out of their knowledge of this fact. These are John Badger, the witch-finder, and a witch known as the White Woman of Broughton. Sybil is kidnapped and concealed, and Francis is falsely accused of her murder. He escapes from prison, and recovers his bride upon the battlefield of Edgehill. We cannot say that the somewhat complicated story is told in such a way as to get any firm grip upon the reader's interest, and we do not think that Mr. Pellatt has either the dramatic power or the archaeological knowledge necessary for a rousing tale of historical adventure. We wonder why, in so many recent romances of this nature, the scene has been laid either in Scotland or in France. English history, especially in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, could afford material for many a stirring narrative. The field is unoccupied, and yet the right man does not come to take possession.

The Royal Christopher. By Justin Huntly McCarthy. (Chatto & Windus.)

THIS is, we believe, Mr. Justin Huntly McCarthy's first essay in the field of adventurous romance. Piracy, shipwreck, a desert island, hand-to-hand fighting, and an undercurrent of love, we have them all, the good old wholesome ingredients of this kind of story. In the manner of the telling, too, we miss nothing of the sententious flavour of Westward Ho! The introduction of a talking parrot in a low-down sailors' haunt is, perhaps, carrying piracy a shade too far; but otherwise in its externals the tale is not all old. There are no fights with Spaniards or buried treasure, but a visionary Captain Marmaduke Amber, who leads a colony to the Southern Seas. With him he takes the narrator and Lancelot Amber, his friend; also, of course, an only daughter, Marjorie, to inspire the necessary romance. The remainder of the characters may be grouped as pirates and colonists. Cornelys Jensen, the leader of the piratical gang, is a shadowy study in duplicity, and so is the dark girl Barbara, who finally revenges her dishonour with his life. The action is slight and soon finished, leading to the supposition that Mr. McCarthy intends to furnish other episodes for his hero, possibly of a less milk- and - watery nature. There is not enough of bloodshed or hairbreadth escape in this first attempt to satisfy the healthy cravings of a schoolboy.

Chun Ti-kung: his Life and Adventures. By Claude A. Rees. (Wm. Heinemann.)

AMONG the joys or terrors of classical youth are a pair of "novels" called Gallus and Charicles, by the worthy Becker. As stories, they fail in after life to convince, being concerned with the adventures of a model young Roman and a model young Greek amid a series of reconstructed social scenes of their respective times. These are the nearest things we can think of for comparison with Chun Ti-kung, the tale of a model young Chinaman. Whether, however, the description of Chinese life and manners, which is the object of the book, will prove as acceptable or enduring as the afore-mentioned classics is another matter. We doubt it, having regard to the indifference of the West towards Eastern customs. Moreover, this is a work of far inferior skill. Chun Ti-kung is an ordinary Chinese prig, without distinction of history or merit, adopted by an impossibly advanced and benevolent uncle. He travels along a river, is brought into contact with dubious characters, joins an expedition against pirates, and takes the "Hanlin" degree. After this he comes to England as interpreter to the Embassy, and from that point the story diverges entirely into a new channel. He deceives and marries an English girl, having already a wife and son in China. He brings her back with him, and after many uninteresting complications leaves her to hear the truth the very instant that her child is born. By way of a finish the unhappy woman drowns herself and the new-born infant. If this is the story proper, the introduction is preposterous; if the first part of the book is the gist, this farfetched addition is irrelevant.

The Arctic Night. By Roger Pocock. (Chapman & Hall.)

THIS is one of a series called "Books for Bicyclists," for whom its special appropriateness is not easy to divine. Some men were encamped in a place called—and this was appropriate enough—Scurvy Gulch. Men shut up as they were that winter "become unhealthy, quarrelling viciously over trifles, lapse into dark moods, ending in hysterical outbreaks, for which it would go hard with one to be held responsible." For they were in the region of Arctic night, and eaten up with scurvy and loneliness. To them arrived, benighted, a most admirable stranger, Colonel Hiram W. Giggleswick, from a Great Country, where colonels abound. "Boys," he said, very soon after his coming, "you've seen considerable of the world. . . . You've all got yarns to tell, and—well, I'm accounted considerable of a liar myself. Now, why shouldn't we submit to hear one another's stories." They did submit, and these stories make up the book. Some of them are pretty good stories, and none are without interest. The use of a device for stringing a number of disconnected tales together is usually disastrous. That in Mr. Pocock's book it is felt as a distinct advantage, is evidence of a respectable literary talent.

Tomalyn's Quest. By G. B. Burgin. (Innes & Co.)

MR. BURGIN strikes a false note at the beginning of his novel. He says that Tomalyn Crane yearned "to grow up and become a man with experiences," and that that was why he was on his way to Constantinople. Of course, we must take Mr. Burgin's word; but, that being so, Tomalyn, like his name, is a bore for a good many pages. Boredom, however, speedily gives way to highly excited interest. Mr. Crane becomes private secretary to Tomkins Pasha, an English soldier in charge of the defences of Turkey. He falls in love with Mrs. Brangwyn, a fascinating widow, just over twenty. Mrs. Brangwyn is affianced to one Gorchoff, an elderly Russian agent; and both are conspirators of the deepest dye. Kourrian, a wily Armenian, is in their service, and seeks to do Tomalyn to death. On the other hand, Smith, a Cockney soldier, formerly in a Hussar regiment, is Mr. Crane's servant, and, though drunk as a rule, more than a match for "this here Kourrian and all the Roosian agents in Turkey." Besides, there is Miss Ulverstone, who loves Tomalyn, but is too ugly to be an "experience" until Tom is in death-grip with typhoid. We have one duel, and a few fights in the English manner: these are told with an excellence that stirs our blood. Dire intrigues abound, and are so well handled that we are almost persuaded to believe them. In short, Mr. Burgin's novel is constructed and written with a skill which fails only in being too solicitous. So determined is he to appease the reader most exacting of sensation, that he transforms Miss Ulverstone into a beauty by engrafting on her cheek the fair skin of Mrs. Brangwyn, become a nun because Kourrian had assassinated Gorchoff. That displeases us. We should have preferred the absence of Miss Ulverstone and a fair fight between Gorchoff and Crane for the beautiful widow. Nevertheless, we like the book. It tells a thrilling tale. All the characters act their parts naturally and well; and, saving that he does not perceive the error implicit in the so-called word commence, Mr. Burgin writes good English.

The Wisdom of the Simple. By Nellie K. Blissett. (Innes & Co.)

To what extent certain "new" tendencies, prominent in the art and literature of a year or two ago, commended themselves to discriminating folk is a matter of opinion. In any case, a sane reaction has set in against the so-called new morality, the modern wickedness, the cult of æsthetic sinners, the gospel of the divine realists, and the like. The body politic has abandoned the new cant, if only to seek it in another form. In 1895 Miss Blissett's strenuous onslaught would have been relevant; to-day it is belated. If, however, from a propagandist point of view, her counterblast is unnecessary, it may be indicative of the coming despotism. Simplicity and guilelessness are admirable qualities in their proper place; but the cant of innocence is more baneful, perhaps, than the cant of thinly-veiled wickedness, for it is more difficult to dethrone. The author of The Wisdom of the Simple has overshot the mark. The book is well, in places even ably, written. Sapher Mayer, the popular actor-manager, well exemplifies the doctrine of art's apartness from life; Severin, the leader of the French realists, is a clever study; and Sharpe, the outspoken critic of all things under heaven, bears some resemblance to a well-known member of that fraternity. "A man must be far better and greater and truer than anything he does, if he is to make it worth the doing"; so says the heroine, and she strikes the keynote of the book. Were it not that the attack on modern movements is foolishly indiscriminate, that Mme. Valeria Mayer is simple to the point of inanity, the story would carry conviction. The style is crisp and forceful, and many of the incidents are treated with great reserve.

A Haunt of Ancient Peace. By Mrs. Marshall. (Seeley & Co.)

THE title of Mrs. Marshall's book—identical, by the way, with that of Mr. Alfred East's canvas recently exhibited at the New Gallery—is restful, significant, and suggestive of the earnest life of the Little Gidding settlement in the seventeenth century which it is her main object to depict. In a book where the narrative interest is slender, we are, and with reason, more than ordinarily exigent as to treatment; moreover, if in a semi-historical romance plot is almost non-existent, especial care must be taken to call up faithfully the atmosphere of the period; every page must be permeated with the spirit of the time, and that without apparent effort on the author's part. Unfortunately, in A Haunt of Ancient Peace the modern and the mediæval are in conflict; the story is a patchwork, not a harmonious whole. Much is said about Nicolas Ferrar; George Herbert's poems are quoted, his personality described; and the sermons of Dr. Donne fill many pages. Withal, we do not feel the glamour of the past upon us; the characters do not breathe: rather they are walking shadows of the men and women of whom we have read. Here and there, indeed, the writer's enthusiasm enables her to penetrate to the essential; but the book is uneven, and though readable, fails to arrest.

THE English reader will be glad to make, or renew, his acquaintance with the Scandinavian novelist Alexander Kielland, even as slightly as Mr. Cassie enables him to do in this little book. The tales and sketches chosen are only partially representative, as Kielland works more naturally in larger space, yet there is here enough charm and power to cause us to be eager to know more of the author. The story, "Karen," a tragedy in half shades, is exceedingly delicate work, and there is a quality new to English readers in "Trofast," the tale of a dog. Kielland has all the Scandinavian sense of the tears in things, the frustration and the irony of life; but he has also humour and penetration and pity. Mr. Cassie's English runs trippingly enough, and is often singularly clean and spirited.

STEPHEN CRANE.

It is sincerely to be hoped that there is no truth in the report of Mr. Stephen Crane's death in Cuba. He is—we are loth to write in the past tense—emphatically a young man with a future, and the new literature could ill afford to lose him.

About six years ago there appeared in New York a small book in paper covers, entitled Maggie: a Child of the Streets, by Johnston Smith. This very modest brochure, which was sold at fifty cents, bore no publisher's imprint, and it may well be supposed that only a few copies were issued. The reason for this is not far to seek. Maggie is not a pleasant book, and in those days the public was not ripe for the reception of instantaneous literary photographs of slum life. No firm cared or dared to associate its name with such a publication. But we have changed all that. One man stood out alone from the mass of unsympathetic reviewers. Mr. Hamlin Garland, perhaps the most genuine of American critics, read Maggie with intense interest, and loudly proclaimed the advent of an author "to be reckoned with." But the public refused to be interested, and Maggie was forgotten by all but a chosen few, who still treasure the little book in paper covers.

Stephen Crane—for "Johnston Smith" and Stephen Crane are, of course, one and the same—is now about twenty-six years old. At the age of sixteen he was writing for several New York papers. He has been writing ever since, and journalism still claims him as one of her most devoted children. At the time of the publication of Maggie he had been working for some time for the Bachelor Syndicate, and it was for them that he wrote his next book, The Red Badge of Courage. This proved very successful as a serial, but the publication in book form was for some reason delayed. Mr. Crane next attracted attention by a small volume of "lines"—he does not call them poems—entitled The Black Riders, which has recently been published in this country. Like so many American authors, he owes his success to British enthusiasm. It was not until The Red Badge of Courage was brought out in this country, in the autumn of 1895, that America "found" its author. Mr. Crane would be the first to acknowledge his indebtedness to the English critics and the English public, who, with one accord, forced his name into well-deserved prominence.

Such, then, in brief, is the history of his short career. Apart from the mass of journalistic work, his literary baggage consists of three slender volumes. Maggie is one of the most downright earnestly-written books ever published. The gruesome tragedy of environment, with all its sordidness of detail, is hammered in with brief, pitiless sentences. Mr. Crane's command of language is remarkable: he does not spare his readers one jot or tittle of the horror of New York slum life. The Black Riders strikes a note of fearless novelty and eccentricity. The "lines" were hurriedly dashed off in a moment of inspiration. They are essentially pessimistic, often cynical. Of The Red Badge of Courage little need be said. That such a photograph of the American War should be produced by a young man of twenty-four is little short of marvellous. Every page reads like the confessions of a veteran, every line reeks of battle smoke, and in every sentence we hear the booming of countless cannon and the ping of the merciless bullets.

Mr. Crane has at least four new volumes in the hands of the publishers. The Little Regiment, a war story, will appear almost immediately; followed by A Woman without Weapons, The Third Violet, and another novel of slum life may be expected very shortly.

FROM A READER'S NOTE-BOOK.

ONE of Mrs. Oliphant's "Stories of the Seen and the Unseen" forms—as in many previous Januarys—the feature of the New Year number of Blackwood. It is called "The Sand of Luspense," and pictures a possible purgatory or place of probation. The idea is both reverent and beautiful. Mrs. Oliphant reaches, indeed, her highest level of excellence in these grave imaginings. The first of them, "A Little Pilgrim in the Unseen," attracted a great deal of attention some years ago, but the most powerful were "On the Dark Mountains" and "The Land of Darkness." If you feel curious as to the possibilities of a place of torment, read the latter. It contains an appalling picture. The stories mentioned have been republished from Maga by Macmillans. But several of the series, notably "The Open Door," and a positively delightful one called "Old Lady Mary," are at present unobtainable. Some day, perhaps, Mrs. Oliphant will give us a volume of these stories arranged in suitable order. In the course of a readable paper on the famous Road Murder in Cornhill, Mr. J. B. Atlay alleges that Sergeant Whicher of that case was the original of Cuffe in The Moonstone, and that Wilkie Collins worked several features of Constance Kent's tragedy into this novel. If true, the fact is interesting. I cannot, by the way, agree with the reports of those booksellers who put Wilkie Collins down among the literary lights of the past who have failed. Much that he wrote had, of course, only temporary vogue, and is now as dead as Queen Anne, but The Moonstone and The Woman in White have plenty of life left in them.

With regard to the following library list it is only necessary to say Miss Soldene's Reminiscences afford a racy sketch of the stage in the early seventies, and the Star Sapphire pictures graphically delineate the grim realities of a nurse's life. The latter is not quite a new book, but seems to have been somewhat overlooked.

POPULAR BOOKS OF 1896.
OPINIONS OF READERS.

LAST week we despatched to a number of prominent men and women a circular and a postcard. The circular asked the recipient to write on the postcard the titles of the two books which had most pleased and interested him in 1896; and in order that the result might be the more instructive and entertaining we chose representative persons in all walks of public life. A large proportion of those to whom we applied responded; a few declined for sufficient reasons. The replies are printed below. It will be seen that some of our correspondents drop into criticism, and a few into autobiography, while here and there an enthusiastic reader is tempted to mention more than the two books we asked for. The total result, we venture to think, will be found interesting.

Mr. HERBERT SPENCER.

My state of health has so greatly reduced my power of reading that what remains I have to reserve rigorously for the purposes of my work. The result is, that I do not read works that are unrelated to it, and for this reason am wholly unable to answer the question you put.

Mr. FREDERIC HARRISON.

Herbert Spencer: Conclusion of Synthetic Philosophy. A landmark in English Philosophy. Prof. Andrew D. White (Cornell University, U.S.): History of the Warfare of Science with Theology in Christendom. A judicial summary of the progress of biblical and theological criticism.

Dr. HERMANN ADLER, Chief Rabbi.

Studies in Judaism, by S. Schechter, M.A. The author, reader in Talmudic in the Cambridge University, has popularised his vast stores of biblical and rabbinical knowledge in this volume in masterly fashion. Jewish Life in the Middle Ages, by Israel Abrahams, M.A. Full of information of an attractive character, culled from obscure sources inaccessible to the ordinary reader.

Mr. ANDREW LANG.

If you mean books of 1896—The Story of Aline, by Mrs. Edward Ridley; and Bijou, by Gyp. If not of 1896, Tom Jones, by Henry Fielding; and The Report of the Lords' Committee on Lamer's Case, 1723.

Mr. MONCURE D. CONWAY.

My reading during 1896 was so closely confined to historical MSS. and last century volumes, connected with my edition of Thomas Paine's writings, that I did not pay a sufficiently critical attention to any contemporary volumes to comply with your request.

Dr. J. E. C. WELLDON, Head Master of Harrow.

Mr. Purcell's Life of Cardinal Manning as a study of character, for I do not doubt that it is a true biography in the main, and the interlacing of good and evil in the Cardinal's character—of self-sacrifice and self-seeking—is a fresh light thrown on the complexity of human nature. Mr. Merriman's The Sowers, as dealing with that profoundly obscure and interesting subject the life of the peasantry in Russia. I assume that the question refers to works recently published.

Mr. H. G. WELLS.

I presume you mean of the books published in 1896. It is hard to name two—no book made such a distinctive effect on me as Jude the Obscure did in '95. The Seven Seas might have done so—only I've still to read the book. Conrad's Outcast of the Islands, Crane's George's Mother and Maggie, Barrie's Margaret Ogilvy, Sullivan's Flame Flower, Stevenson's Weir of Hermiston and Stevens's Monologues of the Dead, have impressed me—heaven alone knows which impressed me most!

Mr. W. ALGERNON LOCKER, Editor of the Morning Post.

The Life of Sir James Stephen, by Mr. Leslie Stephen, which seems to me an almost faultless specimen of biography. The Nation's Awakening, by Spenser Wilkinson, which ought to be read by every politician and patriot.

Sir DOUGLAS STRAIGHT, Editor of the Pall Mall Gazette.

The Amazing Marriage.
The Carissima.

Mr. E. T. COOK, Editor of the Daily News.

Supposing you mean to limit your question to books published in 1896, I reply that the books which have interested me most are Purcell's Life of Manning, and the Life and Letters of Magee.

Mr. A. B. WALKLEY.

Harold Frederic's Illumination. Only "a novel," of course, but a novel full of thought, full of life, tragic, and humorous withal. Que de choses dans un roman! Boswell's Johnson, as re-edited by Birrell and reprinted by Constable. I should have to give this answer for every year in 18—since I was old enough to read and understand. But the editor and printers, between them, have made this strictly a book of 1896.

Mr. J. F. NISBET.

I have not been able to read any English books this year, and I believe a great many busy men are in the same position. Do the leaders of the medical profession, the bar, the financial world, the political world read? Do literary men themselves read anything nowadays except their own proofs? I venture to think not. The busy man keeps abreast of the literary movement of the day, but not by reading. He absorbs it through his pores. I do snatch a little time for reading in the tram, the 'bus, the hansom cab, but devote it to Spanish literature, for which I have a passing craze.

Mr. W. E. NORRIS.

Your question is a little less easy than it looks. Not that I am in any doubt as to No. 1; but there seem to be a good many candidates for the second place. Upon the whole, however, I suppose my humble verdict must be—(1) Weir of Hermiston, by R. L. Stevenson. (2) The Seven Seas, by Rudyard Kipling.

Mrs. MEYNELL.

The question is far too large for me to attempt to answer. But limiting my reply to books of verse by writers new to me, I could say that three have interested me particularly: Units, by Miss Winifred Lucas; Christ in Hades, by Mr. Stephen Phillips; and the Poems of Mr. Money-Coutts.

Mr. SYDNEY GRUNDY.

Augustin Filon's Théâtre Anglais and Raper's Navigation (which does not belong to 1896). Perhaps I should explain that I am interested only in, more or less, technical works, being of opinion that all other books are contained in the Book of Ecclesiastes, and that "much study is a weariness of the flesh."

Dr. R. F. HORTON.

Prof. Fisher's History of Christian Doctrine, the only Dogmengeschichte which brings the story down to the present day; and Joan Seaton, by Mary Beaumont, the only novel of the year which left me better than it found me.

Dr. ROBERTSON NICOLL.

The new books that have most pleased and interested me during 1896 are Margaret Ogilvy, by J. M. Barrie; and W. V.: Her Book, by William Canton.

Mr. A. D. BARTLETT, Superintendent of the Zoological Gardens.

Boulger's Life of Gordon.
Selous's Sunshine and Storm in Rhodesia.

Dr. CLIFFORD.

First, I put Prof. Ezra P. Gould's Commentary on Mark in the International Critical Commentary Series, a book characterised by flawless scholarship, luminous exposition, fearless criticism, a reverent tone, and inspiring suggestiveness. Next comes Zangwill's The Master, to me a tale rich in charm, brilliant in picturing, and supplying the true key to the interpretation of the artist life. But almost, if not quite, equal in interest I ought to name St. Paul, the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, by Prof. W. M. Ramsay, M.A., and The Life of the Rt. Hon. W. E. Forster, by T. Wemyss Reid.

Mr. GRANT ALLEN.

I am not a great reader of general literature, therefore I can only mention books on my own special subjects—Hartland's Legends of Perseus; Simpson's Buddhist Praying Wheel.

Mr. J. N. MASKELYNE, of the Egyptian Hall.

Spielmann's History of Punch; Harris's From Batum to Baghdad. I quote the above as apart from purely technical works, wherein one's interest is naturally influenced by practical considerations.

Mr. ROBERT BLATCHFORD ("Nunquam"), Editor of The Clarion.

I am usually too busy or tired to read anything but tales and verses. The books I read most were Omar Khayyâm (Fitzgerald's), Browning, and Tristram Shandy. The new books were mostly disappointments; but I recall The Heart of Princess Oera with pleasure as being pretty and graceful, and The Red Badge of Courage as being virile and fresh. Few of our popular novelists are more than common tall. Some of them are like men made after supper out of a Dickens or Thackeray paring. The most inane book I have read for years is The Mighty Atom. As for new poetry, well—? Where?

Prof. NORMAN LOCKYER.

A NOTE UPON MR. PATER.

A LITTLE ingathering from the Guardian of nine reviews by Mr. Pater, though privately made and published, appeals to an audience not greatly fewer in number than the honest lovers of that still obscure great man. They are not his honest, or at the least his fortunate, lovers who praise but his grave beauty, passionate scholarship, elect restraint, and who read his measured sentences with only a devout, a careful "recollection." Such solemnity, brought by some to an owl's perfection, is most needless and inappropriate: it is not the right way to read an humorist. Mr. Pater ceaselessly, as it were, pontificating; stiff and stately in his jewelled vestments; moving with serious and slow exactitude through the ritual of his style: that is a Mr. Pater of the uneasy reader, to which his rich humanity seems but a laborious humanism. That reader cannot catch the wise laughter rippling so pleasantly beneath the studied phrases: he is blind to the quiet smile, sometimes innocently malin, which lies as a charm upon the ordered utterance. Humour, that is gentle in its strength, humour rooted in philosophy, humour gravely glad and gleaming, has not the popular chances of humour militant and pranksome, a thing that jerks surprisingly on wires. A great saint is, of necessity, a great humorist, since, like his Maker, he "knows whereof we are made": so too are the princes of poetry and philosophy, and thus we are sad at thinking that Milton and Mill were both without one part of their birthright. "Has God a sense of humour? Can He laugh?" asked a correspondent of Kingsley. "Yes!" came the answer: "because God has all perfections in perfection." Celestial humour, joyous and radiant and undoubting, is an obvious attribute of Omnipotent Omniscience, both in Itself, and as It contemplates free will in man; so, if we go to authority, have Shakespeare and Heine told us. And in proportion to a man's reach and range of vision is his share in the divine humour, his appreciation of "Things in Themselves," to quote Kant, of "Things as They Are," to quote Mr. Kipling. A heroic sense of sorrow, the very profundity of melancholy, are not incongruous with the very clarity of humour: only the narrow and the sour look askance at the sound of the wise laughter. And there are some to whom from early boyhood Mr. Pater, then the author of one book, gave an exhilaration, which it were priggish to call intellectual merely, but which rippled into laughter the growing intellect.

LEIGH HUNT

Let us have done with the fabled Mr. Pater of a strict and strait solemnity, that travesty false and foolish! Flesh and blood, life multiform and variegated, things charged and eloquent with humane emotion, a world starred with points of interest and concern—among that moved the loving and patient genius of the man. Moved, obeying laws of art: so absolute and imperative was the obedience, that it seemed to many the one great thing of note; each single word deliberately chosen! Never a harmless laxity! always a passion of precision! And it was inferred thence that Mr. Pater was a votarist of style for its own exacting sake, not by reason of the reverent value that he set upon his matter, upon the humanities that were his reverent theme. Yet he was instinct with veritable fun, and wrote with quiet mirth, as he elaborated his sense of life's meanings and contents. Never a sentimentalist, he is never found pluming himself upon his pathos or his humour: the notes are never forced. But his descriptions of things gone, old philosophy or old furniture, are steeped in a peaceful irony: his tales of young ambitions now in ashes, of ardent ideals laid in dust, have touches of Horace and of a Kempis, of Pascal and of Montaigne. Loving-kindness, which cares for the vast world's dead, for the live world's "little ones," for what moves or has moved the affections of men—he possessed that loving-kindness in its plenitude. Maudlin tears were far from his eyes, facile laughter from his lips: his "humours" were philosophic and natural, like those of Mr. Patmore and Mr. Meredith. But they are direct creators: he an indirect. So, many have read him with the loins girt, the brows knit, because he is a scholar, a critic, a humanist, an academic: when they fall upon a positive and patent jest, it disturbs them: this is levity, Mr. Pater forgets himself! They have been deaf and blind to the winning insinuations of a delicious pleasantry upon every page: they would be horrified with much amazement, to learn that some readers, in some moods, waver long between the election of Lamb or of Mr. Pater for a winter night's companion. But truth involves delight: it is so universally. And both Lamb and Mr. Pater were solicitous for the expression of truth, not in its nakedness, but in its felicity: so that many of their perfect sentences communicate a thrill of consentient joy. To masters of the whimsical or the fantastic, our startled admiration may cry Wonderful! To masters of the truth in its beauty, we give a simple Yes! of personal thanks, with a glow at the heart and eyes. "Sudden Glory," says Hobbes, "is the passion which maketh those Grimaces called Laughter." Hobbes meant that somewhat severely, and for a reproach: but it is an exquisite account of the nobler laughter, those of perceptive joy. To find the intrinsic value of Webster the tragedian, or of Marcus Aurelius the tragic, perfectly estimated and set down, raises a "sudden glory" in the reader, a joy which laughs at the perfect capture of a truth, the perfect triumph of the truth: and the reader knows that the writer of the royal sentences had his "sudden glory" also, the joy of having created what is "very good." Most of us view art and all intellectual products with far too awed a seriousness: we cannot take them radiantly, we shrink from gaiety in high places, we check the incipient smiles. Humour in the "hieratic" Mr. Pater! It seems a sacrilegious thought. But the humour is there—there in profluent abundance—as it is in Plato and in Berkeley.

This little book of reprinted reviews is rich in charm. Courtesy of protest and qualification, generosity of praise and appreciation, a note both personal and classical: we find them here. And here, in work of no necessary elaboration, we still find that charm of leisureliness and punctilious ease which is so lovable a mark of Mr. Pater's writing. For he is ever reminding us of the rich talkers who cannot but talk perfect grammar in pleasing rhythm, yet without a wearisome effect of pose or strain. Such a talker will be still more happily correct in his correspondence: his public writing will be flawless. So here, as in the review of some Wordsworthian books, we have an early version of Mr. Pater's essay upon Wordsworth; it is excellently educative to note the differences. But, indeed, distinction could not fail to wait upon his lightest word and work: distinction, which means an exquisite nicety of carriage, at once natural and cultivated, equal to all occasions and never doffed. For he respected the universe, and neither optimists nor pessimists do that. He felt himself to be moving among mystery and beauty, things exceeding great. He spent his life in realising how his fellow-men of the past and of his day behaved themselves under those conditions, what potencies and possibilities were theirs: he was clear of flippancy and of pedantry. Confronted with the world's "magnalities," or with its ephemeral littlenesses, his heart burned within him, and his fine spirit was finely touched. Of great men only can that be often said, and of good men, whose greatness is to be good and unknown.

LIONEL JOHNSON.

ACADEMY PORTRAITS.

X.—LEIGH HUNT.

EVERY generation of literary men in this country, since literature became a trade, has known one or two figures who, though not of the first class, have yet, by reason of some peculiar personal quality, won large audiences. Such a one was Leigh Hunt. In no sense was he great; never for a moment did he rise to greatness, as other men of somewhat similar rank have done—Hood, for example, when he wrote a few of his lyrics—but he filled a position very worthily when he lived, and never since has he been quite replaced. Leigh Hunt's capital was a sunny optimistic temperament, a charming fancy and quick discernment of excellence. So equipped he was ready to write attractive trivialities at a moment's notice. He touched only upon such things as he liked, and touched them superficially. If he did not like a fact he ignored it. As a taster he was among the best; his critical faculty was sound; and although he could not make great and beautiful things himself, he was the first to point to the beautiful things of others.

Leigh Hunt's essays are so good-humoured as to be wearisome unless taken in small doses, and his poetry is mediocre and saccharine. In one little scrap of verse, however, he reached high-water mark. The lines beginning "Jenny kissed me" are exquisitely finished, and as fresh as when he wrote them. Not one of all the versifiers who have come after him and chosen a similar vein has produced anything as good. This is the perfect trifle which, well-known as it is, shall be printed yet again:

"Jenny kissed me when we met,
Jumping from the chair she sat in;
Time, you thief, who love to get Sweets upon your lists, put that in:
Say I'm weary, say I'm sad,
Say that health and wealth have missed me,
Say I'm growing old, but add,
Jenny kissed me!"

Leigh Hunt knew every one. Keats lay sick in his house; Byron and Shelley made him their confidant; Dickens put him into Bleak House as Harold Skimpole; Carlyle walked London with him of nights. His autobiography bristles with great names. Hunt was one of those men whose work falls between that of other and larger minds. In our day we have the case of the late Mr. Hamerton, who was, as it were, "crowded out" by Mr. Ruskin and Robert Louis Stevenson. In a similar way Leigh Hunt was not exactly "wanted," although, as we have said, he won a number of hearers. Compared with his contemporary, Lamb, he had little humour; compared with his contemporary, Hazlitt, he had little wit; yet people who read these twain read also Leigh Hunt—such a happy, rippling, babbling way was his!

This portrait, by Haydon, although the only one that hangs upon the walls of the National Portrait Gallery, does not depict the Leigh Hunt as he is generally conceived. He was not Byronic, except fitfully and at a distance; but Haydon's sitters had the grand manner thrust upon them.

NOTES AND NEWS.

OUR review of Lord Roberts's autobiography, Forty-one Years in India, will be from the pen of Mrs. Flora Annie Steel, the author of On the Face of the Waters. Owing, however, to the fact that Mrs. Steel is now abroad, there may be a little delay in the appearance of her article.

SIR HENRY IRVING has gone into the country to seek that complete rest which will soonest restore him to the Lyceum stage. There has been much speculation as to Sir Henry's ability to resume the exacting part of Richard III. on his recovery. We have reason to believe that he will not attempt it, but that the quiet and slow-moving part of Dr. Primrose in "Olivia" will be the one in which Sir Henry Irving will make his welcome reappearance.

THE lists of books which fill some columns of this number of the ACADEMY are another proof of the sway of the novelist. In the great majority of cases our correspondents confess to having found most pleasure and interest in works of fiction. Some divide their allegiance—giving one vote to a work of more special nature and one to a story; but many are wholly for the story. Only nine poets find a place: Shakespeare (mentioned twice), Browning, Omar Khayyām, Mr. Swinburne, Mr. Kipling (mentioned thrice), Mr. Canton, Mr. Stephen Phillips (mentioned twice), Miss Winifred Lucas and Mr. Money-Coutts. Biographies have been popular, and we suppose always will be, and here Mr. Barrie is first favourite with Margaret Ogilvy. Few persons seem to have solaced themselves with history. Mr. Harold Frederic leads among the novelists with Illumination; Mr. H. S. Merriman and Mr. Stevenson come next.

Two curious parallel selections will be observed. Canon Scott Holland and "Lucas Malet" have each found most interest and pleasure in Zola's Rome and Stevenson's Weir of Hermiston. What is perhaps even more noticeable is the similarity of taste of Mr. Max Beerbohm and the gentleman whom he caricatured for the Christmas number of the Saturday Review—Mr. Wilson Barrett. Both chose the Bible and Shakespeare.

IF, as is stated, the successor to Mr. Bayard as American Ambassador to this country is Colonel John Hay, a literary man will once more occupy the post. Colonel John Hay is the author of a tiny sheaf of some of the best, or at any rate the raciest, ballads that have come across the Atlantic. "Jim Bludso" stands alone; "Little Breeches" and "Banty Tim" could not be excelled, and there are many critics who count "The Mystery of Gilgal" among the masterpieces of American humour. Colonel Hay has also written serious poetry of no little merit, and is joint author of the official Life of President Lincoln, whose secretary he was.

MENTION of Lincoln suggests the examination to which candidates for admission into the New York Police Department have been recently subjected, one of the questions asking what the examinee knew of President Lincoln. The Critic gives a few specimen replies. One constable-elect wrote: "Kind Gentlemen, in reference to the life of Abraham Lincoln would say that I am not personally acquainted with him he was Clurk in a grocery store and could lick any of the village boys. He at one time had a very bad friend who at the end killed him." Another said: "He was at last assassinated, of the effects of which he died." But the champion historian was the author of the following reply: "He was the President that freed the South and let the Dorkey go free and he was shot by Garfield this is all that I remember of pretended Lincoln so I will close hoping that I will pass." There is, however, no reason why the candidate should not make an efficient policeman. Knowledge of American Presidents hardly helps a constable in a street riot.

ANOTHER of the very extensive band of old ladies who once sate on Sir Walter Scott's knee has just been discovered in a Home in Philadelphia. There have been so many applicants for this position that one almost wonders when Sir Walter found time to write at all.

THE Westminster Gazette, pursuing its inquiries into the condition of modern reviewing, has now printed the opinion of Mr. William Archer, Mr. Henry Norman, Mr. Oswald Crawford, and Mr. Le Gallienne. These gentlemen are not at one on all points. Mr. Archer, for example, views the pluralist reviewer with suspicion; Mr. Le Gallienne hails him. If one man writes five good reviews of a book Mr. Le Gallienne is pleased because in that way four inferior reviews are kept out of print. Mr. Crawford holds that most reviewers are mistaken in the line they take. "Reviews," says he, "should be more bright and informing—more personal, as it were—less critical and more expository." Mr. Norman and Mr. Le Gallienne agree that genius and merit will "out." Ten days, says Mr. Le Gallienne, is the utmost period of time for the modern Keats to remain unrecognised. We hope so.

HISTORICAL students in need of a subject might note that Mr. Andrew Lang, in the preface to what he calls the woful history of Pickle the Spy, has this passage: "The Life of the Old Chevalier (James III.) has never been written, and is well worth writing. My own studies, alas! prove that Prince Charles's character was incapable of enduring misfortune. His father, less brilliant and less popular, was a very different man, and, I think, has everything to gain from an unprejudiced examination of his career. He has certainly nothing to lose."

THE action which Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co. brought this week against Mr. Stead resulted quite favourably to this firm of publishers, but it certainly did not settle the limits of permissible extract. Mr. Stead has probably better reason for desiring to know what these limits really are than any man in London. As it is he can only unburden his mind on this complicated subject in the Daily News. He declares his conviction that the publishers have made a mistake in seeking to limit his quotations, and that they will live to realise this. But Mr. Reginald Smith declared on oath in court that the publication of the review of Sir George Trevelyan in the Review of Reviews had injured the sale of that work. We can well believe this. But we suppose that what with the variety of books, and their merits, and the circumstances of their publication, and the different feelings of different authors under different treatment by critics—the question is one that must be answered always on the merits of particular and provocative cases. In the case just settled justice seems to have been done.

THE recent discussion upon the mental and physical development of M. Zola, which has been carried on with so little reticence in the French Press, adds new meaning to the phrase, public man. M. Zola is now public with a completeness that leaves next to nothing unsaid. A hospital patient on the lecture-room operating table is a closed book compared with M. Zola. The two disputants, Dr. Toulouse and Prof. Lombroso, have decided that the novelist is an epileptoid. Apparently, it is necessary to have qualifications of this nature (hystero-epilepsy or paranoic psychosis) before one can rise to eminence in naturalistic fiction. The game seems scarcely worth the candle. Another of M. Zola's attributes, it seems, is "a prehensile foot." These scientific men!—"I thought I knew something about abuse," said someone on reading Prof. Lombroso's report, "but I never dared to tell a man he had a prehensile foot."

MEANWHILE M. Zola is hard at work on his new novel, Paris, the third of the series, which includes Lourdes and Rome. To an interviewer he has said that the book will contain "the whole philosophical balance-sheet of the century; it will even be a synthesis of the development of thought since the Great Revolution. . . . It will not be a book of descriptions and digressions, like Rome, but will be concise in its reproduction of the life and movement of our capital, and rapid and brief in action." M. Zola, it seems, has abandoned the project of writing about this country and people. He is under the impression that a week in London was not long enough to enable him to embark with any confidence upon a psychological examination of the English race.

LAST week, in response to a request from Mr. Mosher, we recapitulated the heads of the difference between Mr. Mosher and Mr. Andrew Lang. We now quote Mr. Lang's final letter to the Critic: "I find that I owe satisfaction to Mr. Mosher in a matter of fact. I have wronged this modest gentleman by underestimating the quantity of his spoils. He really seems to have appropriated more than twenty old forgotten mistranslations of mine from the French and Romanic which I had rejected as worthless. Mr. Mosher picks them up and sells them as the street boys of Naples sell old cigar-ends, and if he finds purchasers for my old cigar-ends, doubtless his conscience will applaud him. It takes so little to make a good man happy!" Here the matter ends on Mr. Lang's side. Mr. Mosher's profits, we imagine, are just beginning.

MR. HERBERT SPENCER has written to the "Cemented Bricks," conveying his thanks for their congratulations on the completion of his great lifework, and for the sympathetic expression of their good wishes. Dr. Richard Garnett, C.B., and Mr. Joseph Knight, are to be the guests of this Society at its annual dinner next week.

THE hon. secretary of the Huxley Memorial Committee reports considerable progress during the past nine months. The amount of money now in hand is £2,900, contributed by persons all over the world. The model for the statue, upon which Mr. Onslow Ford is working, is almost complete. The statue will be in marble, and will be erected in the Natural History Museum at South Kensington. A successful design for the Royal College of Science medal has been made by Mr. L. Bowcher, who is now engaged upon the dies. What other forms the memorial may take depends upon the amount of money still to be received. Donations may be sent to the treasurer, Sir J. Lubbock; or the bankers, Messrs. Robarts, Lubbock & Co. (15, Lombard-street, E.C.); or to the hon. secretary, Prof. G. B. Howes (Royal College of Science, South Kensington, S.W.).

THE Chat Noir has now really closed its doors, and nothing remains but to sum up its history. Its fortunes were bound up in the personality of its founder, Rudolphe Salis. This curious literary innkeeper began life in the Latin Quarter as an artist, where he enjoyed that Vie Bohème which Murger had drawn so well in its heyday. He conceived the idea of opening a café where young poets, journalists, artists, and other eccentric youth might revel in each other's wit. He started the Chat Noir in the Boulevard Rochechouart, whence it was transferred to its present site in the Rue Victor Massé. There the café has opened its doors for many years to the blithe sons of art. Rudolphe Salis amused them well, but he did better in that he gave them the atmosphere in which they could amuse each other. Caran d'Ache and Willette adorned the walls with frescoes, and Salis himself gave lectures in connexion with a shadow pantomime which was long one of the attractions of the place. Such places as the Chat Noir bloom their hour and fade. But M. Salis has not faded, for he talks of founding a theatre.

MR. EDEN PHILLPOTTS, whose new novel of Cornish life, Lying Prophets, is published this week, starts in a few days for a two months' journey in the Mediterranean and the Holy Land.

ADMIRERS of Mr. Stephen Crane will find a sketch from life in his best city manner in the Philistine. The title is "The Men in the Storm," and in a few pages the reader is shown a mass of poor humanity struggling outside a charity-shelter on a snowy afternoon in New York. It is as well done as need be. In the American Book Buyer Mr. Crane has an appreciation of Ouida's Under Two Flags, which is noticeable as coming from the author of The Red Badge of Courage.

AN interesting collection of water-colour drawings and oil paintings, by Miss Catherine E. Hughes and Miss Bertha E. Lewis (pupils of Mr. A. Ludovici), is now being exhibited by Messrs. Clifford & Co., in the Haymarket. Some of the work displays considerable merit. Special mention may be made of two oil paintings by Miss C. Hughes, "Morning, the Marker" and "Spring"; also of a couple of water-colour sketches by Miss Lewis—"A Wet Day" and "Smoke & Snow." The collection is, on the whole, distinctly promising, and the artists have succeeded in catching some of the atmospheric peculiarities of what Charles Kingsley called our "hard, grey weather."

THE annual meeting of the Folk-Lore Society will be held at 22, Albemarle-street, Piccadilly, on Tuesday, January 19, at 8 p.m., after which the new president, Mr. Alfred Nutt, will deliver his presidential address: "The Fairy World of English Literature; its Origin and Nature." The following meeting of the society will be held on Tuesday, February 16, when a paper entitled "The Story of Orendel" will be read by Prof. W. P. Ker.

THE Clarendon Press will publish almost immediately, in two parts, with eight or nine maps, the fourth volume of Mr. C. P. Lucas's Historical Geography of the British Colonies.

MR. FROWDE also announces that to his numerous contributions to the study of Early and Middle English Dr. Sweet has now added a Students' Dictionary of Anglo-Saxon.

THE first monthly part, of which there will be twenty in all, of Messrs. Laurence & Bullen's Encyclopædia of Sport will be ready on February 15.

ANOTHER of the Guild Library volumes, The Old Testament and its Contents, by Prof. Robertson of Glasgow University, has just been issued in Welsh, with a preface by Prof. Davidson, of the New College, Edinburgh. The translator is the Rev. D. E. Jenkins, Portmadoc.

MESSRS. BELL will publish next week in their "Technological Handbooks" series, edited by Sir Henry Trueman Wood, a treatise on The Art and Craft of Coach-building, by Mr. John Philipson.

A NEW work on the commercial policy and enterprise of this country, entitled England's Attainment of Commercial Supremacy, by H. Tipper, will be published by Mr. Elliot Stock very shortly.

MR. ELLIOT STOCK announces a new volume of social and literary essays by J. E. A. Brown, entitled The Four First Things, and Other Essays.

MESSRS. SERVICE & PATON will issue in the early spring, in their Illustrated English Library, Scott's Ivanhoe, illustrated by C. E. Brock, and Lord Lytton's The Last of the Barons, illustrated by Fred. Pegram.

TO-DAY (January 15), G. P. Putnam's Sons publish Mr. E. F. Benson's new story, The Babe, B.A.: Being the Uneventful History of a Young Gentleman at Cambridge University.

THE February part of Chambers' Journal, which begins a new volume, will contain the opening chapters of Mr. Hornuiff's new novel, "My Lord Duke," and a four-chapter story by Mr. Guy Boothby.

MESSRS. HURST & BLACKETT, who recently published a six-shilling illustrated edition of Mrs. Craik's story, John Halifax, Gentleman, are about to issue that work at the popular price of sixpence.

MR. B. FLETCHER ROBINSON, who was responsible for the "Rugby Football" with which Messrs. A. D. Innes & Co. opened their "Isthmian Library," has undertaken the general editorship of the series (vice Mr. Max Pemberton, who resigned on account of the pressure of other work).

MESSRS. SWAN SONNENSCHNEIN & CO., LTD., will shortly publish a new work by Mr. W. Chance, entitled Children under the Poor Law. The book describes in full detail the present methods of dealing with these children, as to whom there has been of late considerable discussion. It also deals with the important subjects of their employment and after care.

MESSRS. SOTHERAN & Co. have ready Part VI. of their sumptuous publication, Dr. R. B. Sharpe's monograph of The Paradiseidae, or Birds of Paradise, and Ptilonorhynchidae, or Bower Birds. The edition is limited to three hundred and fifty copies, and the price is three guineas net.

MR. FISHER UNWIN is publishing next Monday Mr. A. P. Harper's account of Pioneer Work in the New Zealand Alps. Many valuable observations respecting the glacial structures and movements in these mountains are contained in the work, which will also be of interest to the student of natural history. Fifty illustrations and some maps accompany the book, of which there will be an édition de luxe.

THE BOOK MARKET.

A CHAT WITH THE NEWEST PUBLISHER.

IT is not every day, or even every month, that a new publisher is announced. When this happens the future seems big with pleasing possibilities. What new reputations may he not create! I felt this the other day when I called on Mr. Grant Richards, who has just inscribed his name in bold letters over an office in Henrietta-street. Mr. Grant Richards is our newest and perhaps our youngest publisher. His first book appears to-day (Friday), and the world of letters is all before him.

I found Mr. Richards in comfortable quarters. He has grasped at the outset, the great principle of the parlour. He knows that if Turkey produces the worst atrocities, it produces the best carpets. And a tranquil colour scheme, and a top light, and a lounge, are no bad aids to the fine art of publishing. But the art itself, and Mr. Richard's conception of it, were the object of my inquiry.

"What line will you take, Mr. Richards?" I said, feeling I must take one myself.

"That," said Mr. Richards quietly, "I shall leave to the shaping hand of the future. But here is my first book."

"May I record it?" Mr. Richards handed the volume to me with the blush which a publisher wears once in his career—that of pride in his firstborn.

"It has just come in," he added, as I reverently opened the volume. It was Mr. Edward Clodd's new work, Pioneers of Evolution, and those into whose hands the volume will have fallen by the time this article is read will bear me out when I say that I held in my hand a very satisfying piece of book-craft. The neatest green binding in two cloths, thick paper (not too white), a well-built title-page, and several photogravure portraits made up the dress into which Mr. Richards has put his first book—a book that in every page declares itself thoughtful, learned, and humane. I could heartily compliment Mr. Richards on such a start.

"And after this, Mr. Richards?"

"Well, I am now closely engaged on my political year-book, called Politics in 1896. Here is the cover into which it will be put. The chief thing I have to say about it is, that it will not, like most year-books, be cold and judicial in tone. Its articles will be written by such hot partisans as Mr. H. W. Massingham (editor of the Daily Chronicle), Mr. George Bernard Shaw, and Mr. H. D. Traill. These three writers will unburden themselves on the general politics of the year from the extreme points of view of a Conservative, a Liberal, and a Socialist. I want this year-book to be an arena to which posterity, or at least the younger generation, can go, not for dry facts, but for the movement of the battle and the shoutings of the captains."

"Good! and what else?"

"These books," said Mr. Richards, handing me a list, "I shall publish during this year. You will see they include an important work by Mr. Grant Allen."

"Not a hill-top story, Mr. Richards?"

"Not at all. The Evolution of God is an endeavour to trace the evolution of the Christian idea of God from its earliest beginnings in polytheism—first, to the Hebrew monotheistic ideal, and then to the Christian God in three persons. I believe it will attract much attention. Then I shall publish shortly a new and revised edition of Mr. W. T. Stead's Real Ghost Stories; a book of travel, In Court and Kampong, by Mr. Hugh Clifford; and a novel, One Man's View, by Mr. Leonard Merrick. I have also commissioned Mr. Edward Spencer, whom men know as the genial 'Nathaniel Gubbins' of the Sporting Times, to write me a free-and-easy cookery book. It will be called Cakes and Ale: Chapters on Meat and Drink; and while it whets the bodily appetite, it will, I think, satisfy the intellectual one."

"I observe," I replied, "that you are announcing only one novel among a dozen books. Will this be your usual proportional output of fiction?"

"Oh, no; not necessarily. At the same time," continued Mr. Richards, "I regard fiction as highly speculative, and for the present I shall aim to publish books for which a good demand can be predicted among special classes of readers."

"You are going to give us two new anthologies."

"Yes," said Mr. Richards with a smile, "and I have great confidence in each of them. The Anthology of English Verse, which I have asked Mrs. Meynell to make, will appeal strongly, I think, to her compact body of readers and admirers, and the more so because her sole principle of selection will be her personal preference. I have asked her to cull where she will, but cull only what she loves best."

"And when will you give us this volume, Mr. Richards?"

"Probably in next September. And in the same month I shall print Mr. E. V. Lucas's Anthology of Poems for Children."

"Ah! then you are trimming your sails to the new breeze from the nursery?"

"Yes; for I like it, and believe in it. And I am particularly pleased to have secured Mr. Lucas. His recent article in the Fortnightly on 'Children's Poetry' won much attention, and it was while reading it in an advance copy of the magazine that I determined to enlist Mr. Lucas's services if I could. He is now the reward of my promptitude."

Mr. Richards could have confided to me many other fair projects, but I had heard enough to convince me that he comes with goodly gifts in his hands, and with a keen intelligence that we shall learn to thank.

BOOKSELLING NOTES.

OUR symposium of booksellers last week on the older novelists created not a little interest. We hope to find other opportunities of making public the opinions of booksellers on various questions of literary importance.

COMMENTING on the testimony of many of our booksellers' correspondents to the need of good "settings" for the old writers, the Daily News remarks: "It would be a curious development if literary favour generally should thus go by 'setting.' We believe, however, that there is a great deal of truth in it. Just as much journalism, and especially much illustrated journalism, has become of late years a branch to all intents and purposes of the stationery trade, so in the case of books the author is far more dependent than many publishers yet recognise on the arts and graces of the book-binder."

APROPOS of the reissuing of standard novels, we may remind our readers that Messrs. Chatto & Windus are putting their series of Wilkie Collins's novels—hitherto issued in their Piccadilly series—into a new edition, printed in new type, and bound with that modern neatness which will enable the bookseller to place them side by side with the primmest of up-to-date novels. Four volumes—viz., The Woman in White, Antonina, Basil, and Hide and Seek—are already issued. A similar reprint of Charles Reade's novels by the same publishers is now completed in seventeen volumes. The "Gadshill" edition of Dickens, beginning with Pickwick, in two volumes, is also launched. But what is to be the fate of Anthony Trollope?

A COMPLETE set of Notes and Queries is probably one of the first things which an active literary man would desire to receive if he had the wishing-cap of Fortunatus. Since 1849 Notes and Queries has gathered into its pages all that is curious, and out of the way, and difficult to remember. It is a commonplace book that has been kept not by one man, like Southey's, but by many men; and what it does not contain in the way of small historical and literary lore can usually be dispensed with. The complete set of volumes is so rarely offered now by a secondhand bookseller that we willingly chronicle the fact that a set is now exhibited in the window of Mr. Thomas Simmons, of 48a, Charing Cross-road. The ninety-seven volumes are not uniformly bound, but all are bound well, the earlier volumes being in half calf. The price is £25.

In the same road Mr. Karslake shows in his window some interesting drawings and first editions relating to Charles Dickens. Mr. Karslake has had the happy idea of utilising his window for a series of bibliographical and art exhibitions, each lasting a week. Thus Thackeray has had his turn, Dickens reigns now, and next week he will give place to George Eliot, who, in her turn, will yield the window to Charles Lamb. Rare books, prints, and drawings form the material of these instructive little displays. The Dickens drawings already referred to are seven water-colours by Mr. Paul Braddon, and they represent the novelist's residences in London and Rochester.

PERHAPS the most beautiful thing in Holborn at this moment is a Japanese print in the window of Mr. and Mrs. Tregaskis's shop, the "Caxton Head." It is the portrait of an actress, playing her part, and is by the elder Toyoukuni. Colour, verve, and expression, all contribute to the satisfactory impression of this drawing, which is one of some one hundred and fifty, forming the third lot of Japanese prints acquired by Mr. and Mrs. Tregaskis in the last year. With hardly an exception, these prints have been sold at prices ranging from one-shilling-and-sixpence to six shillings, and the run on them has been strong and continuous. No wonder; for such confections of colour and form are not everywhere to be had so cheaply.

THE present lot of prints offered by Mr. and Mrs. Tregaskis had been acquired by a collector in Paris. The elder and the younger Toyoukuni are represented by portraits of actors, geishas, and Court beauties, while the signatures of Hiroshige, Kunisada, and others are to be found in plenty. Two finer prints by Utamaro, purchased at the recent sale of Mr. Ernest Hart's collection, form the only exceptions to low price.

THE St. Martin's-le-Grand, the postman's magazine, has sent a rather good story round the papers. A small West of England postmaster was also a bookseller. In his neighbourhood was a rich, self-made man, a railway contractor, who had built and furnished a large house, but had as yet formed no library. Struck by this want in his new house, he drove to the post-office. "You are a bookseller, Mr. A., I believe?" he said abruptly. "Yes," answered the postmaster. "Very well; I want you to fill up my library for me. I have sixty feet of shelving. I want ten feet of history, ten feet of novels, ten feet of poetry, ten feet of religion, ten feet of science, and ten feet of other sorts of books. I understand you know your business, and I leave the choice of the books to you." After some further talk the order was accepted, and executed to the owner's satisfaction, which was greatly increased when visitors to his house complimented him upon the judicious selection of books in his library.

BOOKS RECEIVED.

THE most notable books of the week are undoubtedly the three volumes in which the autobiographies and letters of Edward Gibbon have been collected and edited by Mr. John Murray and Mr. Rowland E. Prothero. The autobiographies occupy one volume and the letters two. In the introduction which he supplies to the autobiographies Lord Sheffield refers to the singular history of the six autobiographical sketches which Gibbon wrote between the years 1788 and 1793. There was even a slight seventh sketch. Until recently the separate entities of these sketches had never been suspected, so skilfully had they been blended in one narrative by the first Earl of Sheffield, and so completely had that narrative been accepted for a hundred years as a continuous and autographic life. We have now the autobiographies separately and faithfully presented, and styled, for convenience, by Mr. Murray, "Memoirs A, B, C, D, E, and F." They are printed in chronological order, "Memoir F" being first.

Great interest will attach to Mr. Andrew Lang's new historical work, Pickles the Spy and Mr. W. C. Hazlitt's Four Generations of a Literary Family should be mentioned.

THEOLOGY.

ON THE MILLENNIUM. Two lectures by Christopher Wordsworth, D.D.
THE SIGNIFICANCE OF THE OLD TESTAMENT FOR MODERN THEOLOGY. By James Lindsay, M.A. William Blackwood & Sons. 1s.

BIOGRAPHY.

MY THEATRICAL AND MUSICAL RECOLLECTIONS. By Emily Soldene. Downey & Co. 10s. 6d.
FOUR GENERATIONS OF A LITERARY FAMILY. By W. Carew Hazlitt. George Redway.
PRIVATE LETTERS OF EDWARD GIBBON (1753-1794). With an Introduction by the Earl of Sheffield. Edited by Rowland E. Prothero. John Murray. 2 vols.
THE AUTOBIOGRAPHIES OF EDWARD GIBBON. With an Introduction by the Earl of Sheffield. Edited by John Murray.

PARIS LETTER.

(From Our French Correspondent.)

FOLLOWING the example of the great voice of the London middle class, the Journal—witty, literary, and anything but edifying little paper—has betaken itself to discussion by correspondence—only it starts with distinguished names. The Christmas discussion having dismissed itself, with the new year comes the question of the relative merits of French and English betrothals. Remembering, with heartfelt sympathy, the woes of the French jeune fille (not the semi-apocryphal monsters that fill the canvas of M. Marcel Prévost's abominable Demi-Vierges), one welcomes with pleasure and surprise such extremely just and sane views as those of M. Alfred Naquet, the author of the Law of Divorce. The introduction of the English "engagement" into France he would approve of, if it resulted in the emancipation of the maiden martyr, if it were the minor orders of marriage, permitting free intercourse between the lovers to enable them to gain mutual knowledge of one another before marriage. His desire is to see the young girl in France, engaged or not engaged, as free as she is in England and in America, to order her own life.

Count Robert de Montesquiou, brilliant lecturer and poet, befitting his vocation as Parnassian, writes a less practical letter: somewhat nebulous and inconclusive. Long engagements, he maintains, are specially adapted for the pleasure of hardened bachelors, who find their experience in the marriage of others. There may be no such thing as a "delicious marriage," but there are assuredly "delicious engagements," proving the superiority of desire above realisation. But if marriage is to follow the betrothal, he asserts that "the day we read no more" must not be injudiciously deferred, lest the bloom fade and poetry be converted into prose on the threshold of paradise. On the other hand,

"if marriage wisely does not take place, glory to those who do not transform the sparkling betrothal ring into the morose and bare wedding-ring; and long live Petrarch and Dante, those eternal sighers; live Laura and Beatrice, those immortal betrothed."

Consternation has been felt in a certain minor circle, where the literary and advanced abbé is much appreciated, by the Cardinal Archbishop's recent pronouncement against the new fantasy of priests on the edge of revolt: the mondaine conférence to a mixed audience in theatres. This decree, with special directness, hits that somewhat ineffectual revival of Lammenais, the Abbé Charbonnel, who startled a good many of us last year by a profound and striking lecture he delivered on Lammenais, his hero, in the Bodinière, clothed in his soutane and clerical collar, with pictures of ballet girls, heels in air, in infinitesimal raiment of the footlights around him. Whatever might be thought of the views of this drawing-room revolté, there could be but one opinion on the lack of taste and tact in his selection of the Bodinière, with its stale theatrical odours, for a serious dissertation, in the commanding gravity of his priest's garb, that almost involved a direct challenge to Rome. The new order of Cardinal Richard forbids priests to enter a theatre in their soutans, and also forbids them for any reason whatever to doff the soutans. So henceforth the eloquent abbé must content himself with the drawing-room conférence, and the ladies who admire him are in despair.

M. Octave Mirbeau, chiefly immortal as the discoverer of Maeterlinck, writes an exceedingly smart and wise little sketch in to-day's Journal on that modern plague, the literary snob.

"Victor Charri-gaud, a man of infinite wit, a writer of infinite talent, to whom success came too quickly, as well as fortune. You must have been struck in the old days by his strong faculty of observation and his powerful gift of satire, his great and implacable irony that went so directly to the root of human absurdities . . . ; a generous and clear-eyed soul that bravely directed its impulses toward a pure and elevated social ideal, instead of bending to the humiliating level of prejudice and fashion; so seemingly to you. Among the absurdities he so harshly whipped, his special choice was that of snobism."

This is the man until society takes him up and reveals the snob in him. He painted the animal with such force and terrible truth because he was his own unconscious model. The sketch is a biting and effective bit of satire, a modern figure taken sur le vif.

The Figaro, in mortal distress at the information that there is really no symbolism in Ibsen—"we who for the past ten years have been on the watch for the symbol in each of Ibsen's plays, and, admirable fact, so easily discovered it!"—suggests that the defrauded symbolists will now have to look nearer the Pole, and embrace the chillier genius of the more northerly writers just discovered by the Revue Bleue—Runchberg and Paivairinta. When Runchberg and Paivairinta find their Prof. Brandès to prove that they are not symbolists either, it is to be hoped that the Pole itself will have been discovered, with yet more Arctic talent to help to unravel the knots of fate.

Henri Becque, the dramatist, writes in the same Figaro on behalf of the much-abused soliloquy:

"It is certain that a man alone does not talk to himself, he neither expresses his ideas nor his sentiments; but nobody wants him to do so. It is quite the contrary on the stage; here the public wants them and calls for them. . . . How could Hamlet, without soliloquy, have commented on the apparition and have lived so constantly in himself? How, without soliloquy, could George Dandin have spied on his wife and chewed the cud of his deplorable marriage? If soliloquy were suppressed, how many of the most natural and simple cases would be cut out of the drama? One person could not wait for another, nor a lover for his mistress, nor a creditor for his debtor."

CORRESPONDENCE.

EXCALIBUR.

Cambridge: Jan. 12.

Mr. R. Brown, Jun., of Barton-on-Humber, kindly points out that the etymology which I proposed—viz., ex calibe, is insufficient. He tells me that he finds he has a note, dated February 23, 1894, in which he derives Excalibur from æs, chalybs, and byrn, meaning "brown," and equates it to the English name "Brown-steel."

I hold that the introduction into the word of a nominative case æs, apparently in apposition with chalybs, is impossible; but the rest is right. It is now clear that the correct etymology is from ex calibe bruno—i.e., "made of brown steel," of which the English name "Brown-steel" is the correct representative.

For further light see Brown in the New English Dictionary. Brown is well known as having the sense of "burnished" or "bright"; indeed, the verb to burnish is derived from it; the forms brun and burn being convertible. This accounts for the forms caliburn, caliburnus, and the like, in which the preposition ex is omitted.

WALTER W. SKEAT.

Bodleian Library, Oxford: Jan. 9.

If Prof. Skeat looks this up in the New English Dictionary he will find that it is simply a corruption of Geoffrey of Monmouth's Caliburnus, and if he refers to my second letter on "Mons Badonicus and Geoffrey of Monmouth" in the ACADEMY of April 11, 1896, he will find a derivation to which, so far as I know, no one has yet objected. I there derived it from cal-, "stem" or "stalk," a root which exists in Welsh, and an adjective borrowed from the Latin eburnus—so that it would mean "ivory-hilted." A reference to ἐλεφαντίνος in Liddell and Scott will show that the ancients (as well as the moderns) used ivory-hilted swords.

Geoffrey also tells us that Arthur's shield was named Pridwen, and his spear Ron. Pridwen would be excellent Welsh for "White-face," and Ron is the modern Welsh rhon, "spear"—the oldest Welsh having no rh.

CHILDREN IN ART.

London: Jan. 9.

In your interesting notice of the Leighton Exhibition the writer draws attention to the admirably natural portraiture of children in some of his work, and, incidentally, to the infrequency of such portraiture in earlier days, naming two examples of its occurrence. As the point here raised is curious and has been rather neglected by criticism, I ask leave to note a few more instances.

The earliest I can specify may perhaps be the beautiful Holy Family surrounded with young angels bearing baskets of roses, by Angelico da Fiesole, the most precious of the many treasures in the gallery at Perugia; with an analogous group, like a crowd of pretty school girls, by Niccolò da Foligno, in the Brera at Milan (No. 180, catalogue 1892). In this graceful work the influence of Angelico, the artist's senior by some forty years, is easily traceable.

In these pictures some allowance must be made for their archaic style; but the true child underlies it. As art advanced in mastery of form we have Francesco Francia's exquisite altar-piece in the Bentivoglio Chapel of San Giacomo Maggiore in Bologna; wherein the Angeletti seated at the steps of the Virgin's throne seem to be simply portraits of two charming little sisters, born to the family who then (1499) ruled in that city. One is looking to heaven as she strikes the bow across her primitive violin, the younger child waiting the moment when her accompaniment is due. It is a masterwork of enchanting ingenuousness.

That little known but admirable artist, Alessandro Bonvicino, who filled Brescia with treasures, only to be seen there in perfection, has left a group of three young boys, in the dress of the time (probably about 1530), who bring gifts to the Holy Child; the union of youthful curiosity overshadowed by reverence in their faces very skilfully rendered. This altar-piece, brilliantly coloured and well preserved, is now in the Town Gallery.

Two children (in the Uffizi) guarded by St. Martin, forming a much injured church banner, by Andrea del Sarto, are pleasing and simply true to life; a grateful contrast to the showy self-consciousness by which the painter first led Italian sacred art in the path of degeneracy.

To Venice belongs the "little Virgin in an oval halo" going up the Temple steps in Titian's great Accademia picture, named by the reviewer; with the same subject by Tintoret in Santa Maria del Orto, where the fair child is set forth with even more perfect naïveté and simplicity of dress and demeanour.

Although almost beyond the limits of my subject, may here be added a small fresco (in the Brera) of the Virgin as a girl of fourteen (according to the legendary Life) presenting herself a second time in the Temple and praying to be allowed to remain in its service. Her figure is the ideal of modesty and reverence, and while absolutely true to English early maidenhood in dress and features, yet is pervaded, one hardly sees how, with all the dignity and distinction which mark Italian art in its brief perfection. This little masterpiece, ascribed by the catalogue to Luini, in Signor Morelli's judgment was designed by the great but little known Lombard artist, Gaudenzio Ferrari. And with this in the same gallery, we may name a lovely little scene of three young girls playing at hot cockles, and ascribed, with apparent justice, to Luini.

It is curious, however, that in the first instance which I can offer of distinct child portraiture in common life, Lotto's very original family group in the National Gallery, there is a certain awkwardness in the attitude; this very attractive artist has in the child fallen below his usual brilliant success in grown-up portraits.

Art now takes the wider sphere vindicated to itself in the seventeenth century; everything paintable is seized upon as within its range. Thus Vandyc in a portrait (in the Louvre) shows us a father, round the skirt of whose doublet his little girl is peeping; she is full of animation and laughter—a child of modern days. And in the Dutch school, that strange and often misrepresented interlude between ancient and modern figure-painting, some recognition of childhood for its own sake breaks forth; as in Jan Steen's splendid "Feast of S. Nicholas" at Amsterdam, or in two domestic scenes belonging respectively to the Duke of Rutland and Lord Bute. But the defect in beauty common to the school deprives the children of Ostade, Teniers, and others, though truly drawn, of their natural charm. And the same character generally belongs to childhood as it presently appears in our own Hogarth.

These instances may suffice; many more, doubtless, exist, but thus far they appear to be accidental attempts. Childhood in itself and for itself had not yet been grasped as a recognised source of delight by the painter. This great discovery is mainly due to Sir J. Reynolds. We may say that he created the child of art, painted by itself or as part of a group, in some fifty canvases, with an almost unflinching penetration into the very soul and ways of that age. Doubtless our great painter's loftiest skill is shown in his portraits as such, through that gift of his which Wilkie describes as the power of representing "the inner man"; displaying him (if the paradox may be pardoned) more like himself than he ever could have been. Yet we cannot doubt it was in his pictures of children that he, like Shakespeare when creating his women, took the deepest pleasure.

But I have trespassed perhaps too much on your space, and can only now add that Gainsborough in a few instances, Stothard in his early work, Flaxman in his exquisite drawings, with others, have worthily carried on this great English tradition, and find, as your reviewer has noticed, a true successor in our lamented Leighton.

POPE LEO XIII. AND CHLODOWECH.

South Hampstead: Jan. 10.

In a review, in last week's ACADEMY, of "Pope Leo XIII.'s New Poem" which contains a reference to "Clovis," whose baptism, 1,400 years ago, was recently celebrated at Reims, it is said:

"Germany is conscious that this said Clovis sung by the Pope was he who was victorious over the Teuton, and the first two lines of the stanzas which close the poem, despite the pious proviso which follows, may yet be a nursery of international jealousies."

There is no such danger. The Frankish King Chlodowech (Chlodwig, Ludwig), whom the French, on account of the difficulty of pronunciation, call by the softer name of Clovis, was himself a Teuton. Coming to the aid of another Teuton ruler, the Frankish King Sigebert, he overthrew the Alamannic tribe—again a Teuton one, like the Franks who had conquered Gaul and given that country its present name, France. These and other struggles of that epoch were contests between the various German populations, and have nothing to do with "the glory of Gaul," the northern part of that country being then under the dominion of the Frankish Germans, even as other parts of Gaul had been conquered by Teutonic Burgundians and Goths. In this instance, at least, the Bishop of Rome is, therefore, quite safe from German jealousy.

KARL BLIND.

THE MEDIEVAL JEW AND RITUAL MURDER.

London: Jan. 9.

May I be permitted to supplement, by a few more details borrowed from another source, the letter which you did me the honour of publishing in your last issue but one? The author from whom I am about to quote is the late Prof. Gregorovius. "The money market and medical science," says he in his admirable Ghetto, "were almost exclusively in the hands of the Jews (this explains Voltaire's Médecine introduite par les Juifs), and they soon made themselves necessary to the inmates of the Vatican. As doctors and money-lenders they always had access to the Pope when he was needy or ailing, while Jewish women were alike welcome in the homes of the nobility as fortune-tellers." The important Bull of Pius V., dated 1569, accuses those women of worse malpractices than mere fortune-telling. After citing the names of several Jews who were medical advisers to the Popes, the learned professor adds: "As Orientals, and related to the Arabs, the Jews stood high in the estimation of princes and emperors, and the whole world, in fact." And he proceeds to pay a just tribute of praise to the admirable qualities of that race. Who believes in that atrocious calumny, ritual murder, nowadays? No one, I was going to say. Unfortunately, the fanatical outbursts periodically recurring in the Levant and elsewhere among more civilised communities are there to give me the lie.

MUSIC.

ON Saturday afternoon Mr. Chappell gave Beethoven's "Septet," and on Monday evening Schubert's "Octet." In the newspaper announcements the former was styled "celebrated." To the latter that unsatisfactory epithet has not, hitherto, I believe, been applied. Both works always draw large audiences, and need no bush. There are many other works of Beethoven equally deserving of the qualification, yet which are always announced by their plain title. Beethoven in after years spoke of the "Septet" as a sin of his youth; it was, however, no sin, but the fresh, attractive composition of one who was destined to achieve still higher things. Musicians who have frequently heard and admired works of Beethoven's second and third periods are apt, like the master, to look down with a certain contempt upon the earlier ones; of the latter the rising generation can, perhaps, best appreciate the merits. But, after all, how refreshing it is, from time to time, to hear the bright, pure music of the "Septet." Although written nearly one hundred years ago, it will certainly still enjoy a long lease of life.

THE Schubert Octet was written at a period when the composer was in a state of deep dejection, or rather despair, as is known from a letter written by him to his friend Kupelwieser. I cannot agree with the writer in the programme-book when he points out the striking contrast between the happy, delightful strains of the music and the mournful mood of the composer. There are some bright moments in it, yet the greater part, to my thinking, breathes a spirit of deep melancholy; it tells of disappointed hopes, of lost illusions. Even the Scherzo, though it opens in lively manner, has its note of sadness.

THERE is one section of the work in which Schubert descends to a comparatively low level—I refer to the theme and variations. In the art of writing variations, the composer was, as a rule, most successful; but in those under notice there is skill rather than inspiration. Of No. 7, with exception of the Coda, I am afraid to say what I think, lest these lines should fall under the eyes of "G," Schubert's great defender. Opinions may differ as to the intrinsic merit of the variations, yet I believe most musicians would readily agree that they do not represent Schubert at his best. The Octet is a very long work—it takes over an hour in performance, and it almost seems a pity that this movement was not cut out. Had Schubert done so he must have sacrificed either the Scherzo or the Menuetto, the two gems of the work; to that, perhaps, he could not make up his mind.

THE performance by MM. Ries, Gibson, Clinton, Paersch, Wotton, Reynolds, and Piatti, under the leadership of Lady Hallé, was in all respects admirable; the marked attention of the audience, and the enthusiastic applause at the close, must have been most gratifying to the earnest interpreters. There was a reasonable pause of about five minutes after the third movement; in past seasons a more formal break was customary.

FRAGMENTS of another Octet, entirely for wind instruments, have been published in the Breitkopf and Härtel edition of Schubert's works; they consist of a Menuet and Finale. Some day, perhaps, Mr. Chappell will let us hear them.

THE Monday concert must not be dismissed without a word of praise for the artistic and sympathetic rendering of Beethoven's Sonata in A (Op. 69), for piano and 'cello by Mlle. Ilona Erbenschütz and Signor Piatti; also for the lady's excellent playing of three short clever pianoforte pieces by the Norwegian composer Ole Olsen.

EIGHT more Saturday Concerts will be given at the Crystal Palace to complete the forty-first annual series. The first of these will take place on February 27, when the whole of the programme will be devoted to the music of Franz Schubert, in commemoration, though somewhat late, of the centenary of his birth. The Symphony in C of 1828 is, appropriately, the pièce de résistance, for the performance of the work under the direction of Mr. A. Manns, on April 5, 1856, is generally believed to be the first in England. Honour, however, to whom honour is due. Although Mr. Manns has the credit of producing it here, Mendelssohn made two attempts to obtain for the Symphony a hearing at the Philharmonic Society. In 1839 he wrote to Ferdinand Schubert on the subject, but the latter did not answer. Five years later he brought over the band parts, but the reception of the music by the Philharmonic orchestra was "so cold, not to say insulting," that the work was withdrawn; and so, too, was the "Ruy Blas" Overture, which, in consequence of the attitude towards Schubert, Mendelssohn nobly declined to produce. On the authority of Ferdinand Schubert, this Symphony, by the way, met with a similar fate at Paris in 1842: the band refused to play it.

THE "Schubert" programme includes a selection from the "Rosamunde" music, which also was first heard at these concerts. A "Dramatic Scene" for baritone, from the cantata "Lazarus," will prove interesting, although excerpts of this kind are, as a rule, unsatisfactory. The cantata itself is, it is true, imperfect; of the three divisions, only the first, and the greater part of the second, remain. It is strange that this important fragment has never been given at the Palace. "Miriam's Song of Triumph," for soprano, chorus, and orchestra, will also be performed. For the "orchestra" Ferdinand Schubert is responsible; Franz only wrote a pianoforte accompaniment, which he probably meant, at some convenient season, which never came to him, to score. The rest of the programme will consist of songs not yet named. And then there will, of course, be the "G" programme-book filled with sympathetic and enthusiastic comments. Perhaps, too, Sir George may have some new discoveries to disclose! The "Gastein" Symphony, I conclude, has not been found; had this been the case, it would naturally figure on the programme.

AMONG features of interest at the other concerts, I may mention Richard Strauss' new tone-poem, "Also sprach Zarathustra" (Op. 30), a work on a "philosophic basis," which is pretty sure to attract considerable notice and to elicit various opinions. Report speaks highly of the music. Scenes from King Olaf, by M. E. Elgar, a fine work written for the North Staffordshire Festival of last October, and produced there with marked success; and the "Highland Memories" and "Romeo and Juliet" Suites—the former by Mr. Hamish McCunn, the latter by Mr. Edward German.

DR. JOACHIM will pay his annual visit to the Palace on March 13, when he will play Max Bruch's first violin concerto. M. Paderewski will appear a week later, and perform two concertos—Chopin's in F Minor and Liszt's in E Flat.

PROGRAMMES of the first three "Symphony Concerts" at the Queen's Hall have been issued. At the first (February 6), A. Glazounow's Fifth Symphony in B flat (Op. 55) will be produced; and at the second, A. Arensky's First Symphony in B minor (Op. 4), two novelties of interest. The former will be given at the so-called "Schubert" concert on January 30. The Schubert selection, including the B minor Symphony, is excellent, but still I am sorry the management has not thought fit to give the great composer a programme all to himself.

THE music of César Franck is now the subject of comment and discussion in the musical papers of Paris and Brussels, and here in London, especially since the performance of his Symphony to which I recently alluded, there is a fair amount of curiosity concerning a composer who seems to have been extremely quiet and retiring, and who since his death has had no special champion writers to proclaim his merits and sound forth his praises. Some of Franck's friends and pupils look upon him as a genius all but unrecognised. Time will show what value may be attached to their opinion. The war waged against Wagner for so many years is now almost at an end, and it has borne good fruit; many once opposed to the master have realised the fact that he who laughs loudest does not always laugh longest. There is, or ought to be, a general wish among musicians, and especially critics, not to judge a new man by old standards, not to fail to recognise the coming man.

It is not, however, specially about Franck that I meant to write, but about a society of which he was one of the founders. This was the Société Nationale de Musique, which was started in 1871 by MM. Bussine, Saint-Saëns, Franck, Bizet, de Castillon and Duparc. M. Bussine, professor of singing at the Paris Conservatoire, was the real promoter of the scheme. The object of that society was to make known the works of modern French composers. All chamber music at all worthy of the name composed since 1872, and also many orchestral works which since have become part of the regular répertoire of the Lamoureux and Colonne Concerts, were produced there. Among orchestral works by Franck were "Les Béatitudes," considered by one of his most eminent pupils his masterpiece; "Rébecca," Biblical scene; "Le Chasseur Maudit," which we are soon to hear; and "Variations Symphoniques" for pianoforte and orchestra, a most interesting work which forms part of the present Lamoureux répertoire; I heard it in Paris last January.

MR. FOWLES's "British" Concert Society seems to have similar aims, and it is to be hoped will produce equally good results.

DRAMA.

TO the best of my belief I went to see "The Sorrows of Satan," at the Shaftesbury Theatre, with an unbiased mind. I seem to have read a good deal in my time about Miss Marie Corelli, but, to my shame, I confess that I have never read one of her novels. Somebody or other has told me that they are not works of very fine art, and that they are very popular; but if that be true, I see no reason in the two facts why one should cherish wrath against their author. I am not at all sure that it would be good for the writers of finely artistic books to be popular, and since, in any case, but very few of them are ever popular (and then, generally, on some irrelevant ground), popularity the while may go to who can catch it; it is all one to me. I have read also that Miss Corelli does not like critics, and that in the book in question she castigated them. But nobody minds collective abuse, and if Miss Corelli's whip had fallen on my own shoulders I think I should have enjoyed the fun, rather than otherwise. No; I had no prejudice: rather, on the assumption that the other critics were not likely to find the play a work of genius, I should have been humanly pleased to be alone in eulogy.

BUT really I cannot say it was a good play. The construction was poor; there was no strong motive anywhere in it; it wavered between seriousness and farce. It is difficult, I admit, for any play about Satan to do otherwise: unless he be kept strictly on a plane of tragedy, the familiarity of his allusions must make them inevitably comic. The Satan in this play, which has been adapted from the novel by Mr. Woodgate and Mr. Burton, was made both pathetic, so far as intention went, and intentionally as well as unintentionally comic. The idea of him was, that every time he succeeded in corrupting anybody he lost one, so to speak, and when anybody resisted his temptation one was scored to him: in other words, he had to tempt, hoping all the time he might not succeed. That was pathetic, in a way, and might have been made, conceivably, a motive of poetry. But convention, I suppose, impelled the authors of the play to put "cynical" remarks into his mouth, and to make him allude, in quasi-jocular fashion, to the place whence he came, and the result was an ineffective mixture. The pathetic, topsy-turvy element was a poor thing to playgoers accustomed to business-like and ingenious devils, with their pleasant appeal to the perverse in all of us; and the comic element was not good of its kind. The "cynicism" was of the most outworn character, and Satan's inconvenient goodness of heart robbed the Satanic laugh of its force.

BUT if he was necessarily ineffective, far more so were the others. The hero was a miserable weakling, a feeble poseur—first as a humbugging, "neglected genius" ("they have kept me down," and so forth), and afterwards as a wronged husband. In the latter rôle he was peculiarly incredible, because he had married his wife in the face of her repeated declaration that she disliked him and only wanted his money. The wife had a certain definiteness of character in her straightforward sordidness and immorality, but she was spoiled by foolish complaints of the iniquity of her "world," and by a wearisome soliloquy after she had taken poison. At this point, by the way, was the one dramatic moment of the play, when the dying wife at last recognises Satan in the Prince whom she had loved, and dies before she can tell her husband: that was dramatic—in scheme at least. But to return to the characters. Even "Mavis Clare, an authoress," the good angel of the piece, was not a dramatic character. She was, indeed, the only person who was kind to poor Satan, in that she refused to be tempted, refused money with which to bribe her "enemies"—the critics, I suppose. Nobody ever tries to bribe me. But she was not a very amiable character. It was really heartless impertinence in her to go (beautifully dressed and sweetly smiling) to patronise the poor "literary" man, whom she did not know, in his garret, and it was wearisome to hear people sympathise with her necessity of "writing against time," to observe her own attitude of sweet superiority. Her conversation suggested that she kept her flower of intellect for her books. The other characters, with the exception of Satan's valet, were of low comedy—a publisher, two solicitors, a duke, an American heiress were the ordinary "comic relief" of melodrama.

THERE was some good acting in the piece. When Mr. Waller, as Satan, remarked, "What a contemptible thing is man: he aspires to be lord of the universe, and he is the slave of his own passions"—I think those were his very words—the platitude sounded quite dignified and impressive. He was best in his sarcastic and comic moments; but all through his fine voice and plausible manner saved his part so far as salvation was possible. Mr. Yorke Stephens worked hard as the "literary" man, and was as near life as the authors allowed. Mr. Beauchamp was clever as a comic peer. Mr. O'Neil looked rather fiendish as the valet-fiend. Miss Granville's contempt of her rich suitor was not politely expressed, but that may not have been her fault: her death-scene was fairly good. Miss Brinsley Sheridan spoke her lines and wore her dresses very well as Mavis Clare. It was not her fault if the part was irritating.

THE final scene reminded me of a story in Dean Hole's Reminiscences—I think they were Dean Hole's. At the age of eight he wrote a play, which began: "Act I. Scene I. The Sea Shore. Enter a man swimming for his life." That is how "The Sorrows of Satan" ends—the literary man battling with the agitated carpet, and Satan, in armour, addressing him from aloft. It did not move me much.

I suppose everybody will go to see the new "play without words" at the Prince of Wales's Theatre in the afternoon, and everybody will be right. M. Beissier's "Histoire d'un Pierrot"—"A Pierrot's Life" is a slightly clumsy phrase, by the way—is not so good as "L'Enfant Prodigue," but it is good, and it is better acted than are most plays. You will miss Mme. Jane May, with her supple body, her pathetic look, her delightful gamin gestures. And you will see nothing so comic as the unapproachable reading of the newspaper by the old people in the earlier play. But you will see grace, subtle expression, and at least two most amusing effects. The story is a commonplace one of domestic life, in essentials. Pierrot, his courage screwed up by Pochinet, a friendly neighbour, wins to wife Louisette, a milliner. But married life and poverty bore him, and he goes away with a temptress. And then he comes back destitute, and the good Pochinet reconciles him with Louisette. The great opportunity was Pochinet's, and Signor Egidio Rossi used it admirably. His lesson in love-making before a milliner's block was delightful, and so was his story of the two doves, of the male dove who flew away and limped home again. His pantomime here, the sudden change from the soaring bird to the bird limping with broken wing, was a most artistic trick, and received an instantaneous ovation which was pleasant to hear. Mdlle. Litini, as Pierrot, supported him very well in the love-making scene. Her strong point, otherwise, was in the expression of boredom and weariness, which she did to admiration. Mme. Germaine Ety was a clever Louisette—excellent in artless archness in the first act, not quite so excellent in pathetic sorrow in the last. La Petite Gaudry, as a little Pierrot—Pierrot's son—was a weirdly wise and appealing child. M. Costa's music was very pretty throughout, and now and then something more—but I have no pretensions to be a judge of music.

The action of these "plays without words" is really a compromise. It is partly natural gesture accentuated, as though the performers were saying words you could not hear—which may be the case—and partly conventional signs of pantomime. There is, of course, the suggestion of actions by imitation, as in the telling of a story—in the doves' story, for example—but that may be fairly considered as of the former element. I should very much like to see the purely conventional signs eliminated, and believe that were that done, with such acting as this, the dramatic illusion would be stronger than in the vast majority of spoken plays.

"DELICATE GROUND" was revived on Tuesday at Terry's Theatre as a curtain raiser to "The Eider-down Quilt." It is a pleasant little piece, with substantially the plot of "Divorçons"; and it was artistically played by Miss Lena Ashwell, Mr. Arthur Playfair, and Mr. Cosmo Stuart.

SCIENCE.

PROF. SILVANUS THOMPSON'S lectures on "Light," which have just proved such a "draw" at the Royal Institution, are to be published in a few days by Messrs. Macmillan in book form. Meantime the Royal Institution is announcing a fairly varied lecture list for the coming season. Dr. Mandell Creighton will discourse on the evening of February 5 about "The Picturesque in History"—a theme which might be handled with delicate sarcasm—and Prof. J. C. Boase, whose recent experience of Pearson's entitles him to lecture on the "Picturesque in Interviewing," will deliver an address instead on "The Polarisation of the Electric Ray," the date being January 29. On Wednesday last Prof. A. D. Waller, the newly appointed Professor of Physiology, began a course of twelve lectures on "Animal Electricity"; a course on "Some Secrets of Crystals" will be begun on January 21 by Prof. H. A. Miers; and on the 23rd Mr. Carl Armbruster, of the Bayreuth orchestra, will start another on "Some Neglected Italian and French Composers."

M. PIETTE has discovered, and L'Anthropologie has published, a pretty puzzle for decipherers of old and dead inscriptions. The Neolithic troglodyte dwellings of Mas d'Azil, in the department of Ariège, have been found to contain large quantities of rounded stones, marked with devices that point to some conception of number or a simple form of alphabet; and if this be the case, we have the oldest documentary records in existence, for M. Piette places his find at the close of the glacial period, in an intermediate transitional epoch between that and the Stone Age proper. The markings, which could by no possibility be accidental, are painted in peroxide of iron, and consist partly of parallel lines or dots up to eight in the former case and twenty-three in the latter. These M. Piette classifies as "numerals," hazarding incidentally some rather wild speculations as to the possible meaning of certain groups of dots, which he thinks might represent high numbers. Besides these simple markings, however, are other more varied ones which are classified as "symbols," "pictorial signs," and "alphabets." A few common forms, such as snakes, seem to be recognisable, but for the most part the symbols are vague. Crosses are abundant, and there are fairly large numbers of the supposed letters or inscriptions.

JUDGING from the illustrations themselves, there is nothing but the initial improbability to prevent our accepting M. Piette's startling theory. The forms are as suggestive as those of any very ancient alphabet, and should a few more examples occur who shall say that we need despair of some day reading a chapter in the earliest records of man's life upon the earth? The successes of glyptoglyphists in the past show that skill and patience will triumph over almost any obstacle. The indecipherable inscriptions of dead ages are fast yielding up their secrets, so that an unknown language in an unknown script is no longer a formidable stumbling-block. To take one instance only, Egyptian hieroglyphs, which till Champollion were practically an unsolvable riddle, have not only proved within the past half century a fertile source of history, but have even been reduced to the limits of a text-book and a grammar by that indefatigable Egyptologist Mr. Wallis Budge.

THE introduction of the mongoose into Jamaica marks one of the standard instances of unexpected results following upon an attempt to artificialise the process of natural selection, and takes rank as a warning with the plague of rabbits and thistles in Australia. A new chapter in the natural history of Jamaica has just been issued, and if the story was interesting before it is ten times more so now. The mongoose was introduced from India, in 1872, in order to abate the pest of rats which infested the sugar-canes, and after performing this salutary duty it increased and multiplied to such an extent that not only the rats and mice but most of the living species of the island were threatened with extinction. Poultry suffered first, but the depredations extended to young pigs, kids, lambs, newly dropped calves, puppies, and kittens. Game of all kinds was attacked, both living and in the egg. The marauder could even fish, and made such a specialty of snakes, ground lizards, frogs, turtles, and land-crabs that many kinds of these entirely disappeared. Finally, the mongoose developed a ravenous desire for bananas, pineapples, young corn, avocado pears, cocoas, yams, and the sugar-canes which it had been called in to protect, winding up its acquired tastes with an appetite for salt-meat.

THE above is a mere abstract from a report by Mr. Duerden, of the Jamaica Institute Museum, republished in Science. The result was, as I have said, a wholesale disappearance of species. A few birds, like the ground-dove, had the sense to shift their breeding-places to the tops of the prickly cacti, where they were safe; but other animals, and the reptiles in particular, suffered so severely that many kinds were believed for years to be extinct. As a consequence there arose yet another plague. Insects like the ticks and "jiggers" (or chiggers), which used to be kept down by the snakes, increased so overpoweringly that men and cattle were grievously infested. One could not walk without being covered with them. The victory over the island remained with the tick and the mongoose, until, within the past year or two, a fresh stage set in. The mongoose suddenly began to be less plentiful, and it was found that he had fallen victim to the tick. The results of the diminution are shown in a gradual reappearance of other beasts, birds, and reptiles. Among the snakes there is a very marked increase, and even the ground lizard, supposed to be quite extinct, has become common again. The balance of life has begun to reassert itself, and naturalists will watch with curiosity for a complete reinstatement of the previous fauna. The renewed depredations of rats are hailed as an advent of salvation, and, odd as it may sound, the increase in numbers of the crocodile is taken as a happy omen. The Jamaicans are not likely to make further experiments in this interesting domain of natural history, but will adhere in future to such present evils as they have. For them, at any rate, it has been no "imaginary mongoose."

PROF. JOSEPH JASTROW, of the University of Wisconsin, proposes the following little problem in logic as a means of testing diversity of opinion:

Granted that A is B, to prove that B is A, B (like everything else) is either A or not A. If B is not A, then by our first premise we have the syllogism—
A is B.
B is not A.
∴ A is not A, which is absurd.
Therefore B is A.

Is this reasoning correct, he asks, or is it not? Answers are requested from all who are interested in the matter, particularly from those whose interest in thought is a philosophical one, as well as from those devoted to scientific pursuits.

I HAVE received an advance copy of a report on the City and Guilds of London Technical Institute, in Exhibition-road, ordered to be made by the Governors in consequence of an anonymous pamphlet which appeared last year, in which the Institute and everybody connected with it were somewhat energetically attacked. I have read the report with interest, because it contains a good deal of valuable information as to the cost and work of kindred colleges both at home and abroad; and, incidentally, I am glad to see that the Institute is vindicated in every particular. As regards annual expenditure, salaries, and cost per student it compares favourably with such well-known colleges as the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, the Johns Hopkins and Cornell Universities, and the great German laboratories, all of which have larger numbers of students to deal with and very considerable endowments. The City and Guilds Institute was the outcome of a deliberate and carefully drawn-up scheme, which received the warm sanction of many eminent educationalists, including the late Prof. Huxley. It has a splendid staff of professors and assistants, and I am glad to speak from personal experience of the excellent scientific methods which prevail within its walls. In the whole report, which is drawn up after a most critical examination by a committee of thirty such men as Sir Douglas Galton, Sir Frederick Abel, Lord Kelvin, Sir William Anderson, and Mr. Wolfe Barry, I can only find one improvement suggested or hinted at, and that is that the salaries of the leading professors should be raised. If this be the case, it does not seem to me that the affairs of the Institute can be such as to call for immediate or radical reform.

BOOK REVIEWS REVIEWED.

"Life and Labour of the People in London," edited by Charles Booth. Vol. VIII. (Macmillan.)

"EVERYONE NOW," writes the Speaker, "wants to know how everybody else lives; . . . for London, at least, the answers given by Mr. Booth's nine volumes will be as near completeness as possible." For "the real interest . . . lies . . . in the multitude of curious illustrations of social life . . . which Mr. Booth and his helpers have set before us." "In part i.," observes the British Review, "which has been entrusted to other hands than the editor's, we find rather meagre information under somewhat ambitious titles. . . . Where are the statistics we long for of the average earnings of the dramatist, novelist, and poet . . . ? Where is the graphic picture, like that of the Rooneys [a stock of hereditary paupers], of families with the taint of literature in their blood for generations . . . ?" The same critic quotes as thoroughly Gilbertian the subdivisions of the class "Unoccupied": "peer, independent, expert (undefined), landlady, lunatic, gipsy, ward in Chancery, patentee, medical student, Privy Councillor, and M.P." "Another worthy instalment," says the Chronicle, "of the most searching study of city life that has ever been undertaken," and extracts a column and a half of extensive and peculiar details. The Manchester Guardian treats it in the same manner and at equal length, concluding: ". . . it is uncommonly rich in novel social observation, and it is to be hoped that new readers may . . . be attracted to it, who will then fall under the fascination of this wonderful social map of London, as one of the most memorable of contemporary contributions to economic literature." The Morning Post congratulates the editor upon having "arrived within measurable distance of the completion of the prodigious task which he . . . has carried out with singular success."

"Without Prejudice." By I. Zangwill. (Fisher Unwin.)

SAYS H. G. W. in the Saturday: "Allied to his excessive self-confidence is . . . the incapacity to eliminate bad work . . . Mr. Zangwill fails because he has no selection. . . . He has industry, ambition, a fine memory, wit, emotional force. . . . About one-eighth of the present book . . . is matter of which no one need be ashamed . . . He is always on the verge of success. . . . The book leaves one wondering whether Mr. Zangwill is for ever a clever fool, or whether he will one day live down this egoism of his, and take the place his indisputable abilities might give him." "Mr. Zangwill," writes the Spectator, "is one of the foremost among the band of modern writers whose especial mission it is to instruct and reprove an older generation." He professes himself an egoist, "but to be a natural and successful egoist is almost the most difficult art in the world. . . . The connexion of thought should be lucid and without strain. . . . The egoist who fails in this wants the 't' in his name. . . . An egoist should be an optimist . . . and take far more indulgent views of that . . . excessively prevalent creature, the Average-Man." Let him meditate on this "humorous inversion":

"The time is out of joint. Oh, blessed spite! How lucky we were born to set it right."

"The book," says the Chronicle, "is not a piece of literature at all, but a bundle of copy. . . . Mr. Zangwill calls it a 'selection'—heavens! what can he have rejected?" It is simply a companion to the daily paper . . . and there are scores of allusions that already require a footnote. . . . Yet there are excellent and memorable things. Mr. Zangwill has a quick, capacious, and singularly well-furnished mind; he is, in his way, both a thinker and a poet. . . . The real mischief is that he . . . will deck a really fine thought in the cheapest gewgaws of journalese; he will let a . . . brilliant epigram jostle with a timeworn tag of pinchbeck facetiousness." "It would be unreasonable," says the Manchester Guardian, "to wish to compare this volume with Mr. Zangwill's more serious work."

"A STORY without a plot," says the Pall Mall Gazette. By Percy White. (Heinemann.)

"All the characters are studies except one," which is "one of the most brilliantly executed portraits in modern fiction, the portrait of Louis Otway, philosopher and pessimist. . . . The irony of it all is delicious." "Compared to his two former books Andria is," says the Athenaeum, "as water to wine. . . . There is much in Andria that tells of vigour and an acute faculty for observation and generalisation, but there is less brilliance and power in the dialogue, and a good deal less humour." "The dialogue," writes the Telegraph (?), ". . . sparkles with brilliant humour and trenchant epigram." Andria's brother, Arthur Vincent, is "one of Mr. White's happiest creations." The Globe gives a dozen lines to the book, in the course of which we are informed that Andria and Louis Otway are drawn "with care and skill," and that one follows the development of their relations and characters "with quiet interest." The Chronicle says "it is not an interesting story. . . . The characterisation is clever, but, as a whole, the book is quite unworthy of the pen which gave us Corruption."

METHOD GASPEY-OTTO-SAUER.

The advantage which this Method has over all others in its combination of theory and practice, i.e., a clear scientific exposition of the grammar, combined with numerous practical exercises. By strictly adhering to this method, the great difficulty of enabling the pupil to speak and write foreign languages has been successfully solved for the first time.

(Desk or Pocket size).

It can be carried in the pocket in any position.

The ink can never spill in the pocket: it is a physical impossibility for it to do so.

It has a gold nib, iridium tipped, of the finest quality—fine, medium, or broad point, as ordered.

It writes instantaneously, without shaking or dipping.

Made in several sizes. Price 12/6.

A Perfect Lead Pencil.

The Blaisdell
Self-Sharpening
Pencil.

"A remarkably smart contrivance."
Black and White.
"Surely a boon to all busy people."
Westminster Budget.
"A design in lead pencils that deserves populari'y."—Morning Leader.
"I hope he may make a fortune by it."—Truth.

The Blaisdell Self-Sharpening Pencil looks like an ordinary pencil, and is used like an ordinary pencil. It is the same size as an ordinary pencil. It costs no more than an ordinary pencil of the same quality.

But it lasts at the very least twice as long, because there is none of the waste that occurs through breakage of the lead in sharpening a cedar pencil. This is more especially noticeable in the case of blue and red pencils.
In using an ordinary coloured pencil, probably half the crayon-lead is wasted in cutting, and another quarter by the lead breaking in use. The Blaisdell coloured pencils waste none of the crayon in cutting, for there is no cutting to be done, and the crayon does not readily break in use. Hence the saving in lead alone is very great, and the saving of time, trouble, and annoyance is greater still.
There are no chips, no dirty smears from crayon dust, and a perfect point is produced instantaneously whenever needed. The same is true of the black-lead Blaisdell Pencil.

The paper covering holds firm until it is desired to remove it. Then all that is necessary is to break the outer cover with a knife or pin, and pull off a spiral of paper.
The new point is then ready for use.

Blaisdell Pencils, whether black or coloured, are made in but one quality—the best;
but the black-lead pencil is made in all grades of hardness for writing or drawing.

NEW NOVEL BY E. F. BENSON (Author of "Dodo")

THE BABE, B.A.:

Being the Uneventful History of a Young Gentleman at Cambridge University.

Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 6s.

Now ready, at all Libraries and Booksellers.

MR. ROBERT W. CHAMBERS' NEW BOOK.

THE MAKER OF MOONS.

Illustrated. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 6s.

The New Saturday.—"This volume of short stories is written in a style which has the rare charm of novelty. Into most of the tales a supernatural element enters, but Mr. Chambers touches the mystical with so deft a hand that they appear almost credible to the most prosaic readers."

The Scotsman.—"A vigorous spirit, as well as a delicate art and a bold imagination, has gone to the making of these tales." The Daily Telegraph.—"We cannot for the moment recall to mind any latter-day collection of short tales in which vivacious fancy and subtle wit are so happily combined with constructive dexterity and descriptive force.... Everybody should read these delightful stories."

BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

THE RED REPUBLIC.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

The Academy.—"The 'Red Republic' is the most vivid certainly, and I think the most enthralling narrative of the evil days of the Commune which any romancer has given us."

THE KING AND A FEW DUKES.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

The Academy.—"The fantastically extravagant narrative proceeds with unflagging verve, and indeed often with a charming suggestion of delicate style."

ARDEN OF FAVERSHAM. Edited by the Rev. RONALD BAYNE, University College, Oxford.

The Spectator says:—"Mr. Wells is a true magician... Quite the best novel that has hitherto been inspired by the cult of the wheel.... This 'brilliant and entertaining book'."

THE WHEELS OF CHANCE. By

H. G. WELLS Author of "The Wonderful Visit," &c. With 48 Illustrations by J. Ayton Symington. Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

The St. James's Gazette says:—"A surprising, a really remarkable success. While we were quite alive to his fantastic and abundant originality, we never before gave him credit for so much variety in method, for so much humour, so much vivacity, and, above all, for so delicate and sympathetic a humanity as he displays in 'The Wheels of Chance.'... Mr. Wells has done an excellent piece of work, and one that is certain of success."

The Athenaeum says:—"The 'Wheels of Chance' is even better than the author's amusing and original work called 'The Wonderful Visit'.... So ingeniously does Mr. Wells work together the humorous of the bicycle the charms of terse and vivid description, and the uncertainties of adventure, and so cleverly and sympathetically does he portray the character of the hero, mixing with his oddities a dash of the true gentleman, that one may fairly assign to 'The Wheels of Chance' a high place among current works of fanciful romance."

THE FLAME FLOWER, and

OTHER STORIES. Written, and Illustrated with about 100 Drawings, by J. F. SULLIVAN. Imperial 16mo 4s. net.

Mr. H. G. Wells in the Academy says:—"It is long since any new book proffered such delightful entertainment as Mr. J. F. Sullivan has given us.... Whosoever reads this book at my instigation will retain a spark of gratitude towards me on that account.... This fantastic volume is as unique and perfect as mortal enterprise can be."

JOAN SEATON: a Story of Peregrination in the Yorkshire Dales. By MARY BEAUMONT. Author of "A Ringby Lass." Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

The Daily Telegraph says:—"This remarkable book has three conspicuous merits. First of all it does for an English countryside what Mr. Barrie does for France and Ian MacLaren for Drumtochty. It reveals the humour, the pathos, the dignity, and the nobility of the Yorkshire dale-folk.... But 'Joan Seaton' has a second merit. It is a noble and a moving story.... And this leads us to the third and most conspicuous merit.... Miss Beaumont.... puts a noble restraint upon herself and has produced a book in the chaste and exquisite style which was once thought to be a claim upon the attention of the reading world."

The Scotsman says:—"It is admirably written.... The book is a valuable addition to the literature of the Yorkshire Dales."

MISTRESS SPITFIRE: a Ro-

manche of the Civil War. By J. S. FLETCHER. Author of "When Charles the First was King." Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

The Scotsman says:—"We follow the developments of the tale with breathless interest. The siege of the Manor House is a well-conceived and spirited business.... It holds its fascination to the last page."

The Pall Mall Gazette says:—"Original and finely carried out, and a 'rattling good story'.... Mr. Fletcher will go far as a writer of historical novels."

A SPECIAL PROSPECTUS of both the DRAMATISTS and CLASSICS, and the NEW GENERAL CATALOGUE will be sent to any address on receipt of a postcard.

JUDGE AND WIT.

Lord Bowen: a Biographical Sketch. With a Selection from his Verses. By Sir Henry Stewart Cunningham, K.C.I.E. (John Murray.)

ENGLAND might be very proud of its Bench if Lord Bowen were to be taken as one of its average occupants. In devotion to duty and in rectitude he was doubtless among compeers; but in freshness of mind and in pliability of sentiment he was easily marked off from the mass of his fellows. Judges and Bishops have such a trick of merging the man into the official that they have long ceased to be of much personal interest to the public. The pivot round which all their work revolves is "my position," rarely "my heart." And thus it happens that, when amid this human furniture you find yourself face to face with a fellow creature, in sensitive touch with all the common interests of mankind, their amazing hopes and their pathetic fears, you feel drawn to him by all the cords of brotherhood. Lord Bowen stood high in his profession; but his comparatively short career as a judge is not likely to have left great marks on the theory or practice of English law; and it is for what he was, rather than for what he did, that his name will be held in remembrance by readers of his friend Sir H. Cunningham's slight and artless, but sufficient, biography.

Charles Synge Christopher Bowen was a New Year's-day baby in 1835, being born at Woolaston, a Gloucestershire village, of which his father, Irish by descent and Evangelical in religion, was rector. Charles had Austrian blood mixed with his Irish, for his mother's grandfather was Count d'Alton, an Imperial Chamberlain to Joseph II. He was made yet more of a cosmopolitan by being sent at the age of ten to school at Lille—at which time he had already learnt and liked a little Greek. He was a great reader as a boy; and the works of Shakespeare, Spenser, Scott, and Johnson made him forget his expatriation. At the age of fifteen he went to Rugby, where he was placed in the highest form possible to a new boy, and had for his master Bradley, now Dean of Westminster. His cleverness and diligence won him honours in classics and history; he was good, too, at games, and Rugby boys had only to prefix a B to two lines of an ode of Gray's to sing their young hero:

"Owen's praise demands my song, Owen swift and Owen strong."

A Balliol scholarship introduced Bowen to Oxford and to Jowett's tutorship—undoubtedly an influence in his life. The temperament for "Evangelicalism," to use a cant word, and the temperament for scholarship had begun to be regarded as incompatibles; and where an earlier generation of Oxford men of mind had yielded to the influence of Newman, so now a younger set, grouped most strongly at Balliol, bowed deferentially to the obiter dicta of Dr. Jowett. The result in Bowen's case was a general disbelief in Christian dogma, a disbelief not obtruded upon others, nor incompatible with his attendance at church on Judges' Sunday as a sort of State duty. The influence of a university on its sons is the subject of absurd and even superstitious exaggeration; and if a college is to claim as its own credit the career of this or that distinguished man, it must be asked to bear the odium of the great mass of mediocrities it sends forth year by year to add to the dulness of the world. "Nature is stronger than education," remarks Contarini Fleming; and Lord Beaconsfield himself owed everything to the individuality which, though it could resist successfully the drilled laughter of the House of Commons at a later date, might have yielded something to the machinery of a university in earlier years had he ever been subjected to its wear and tear. But a university that does not breed great men can at least help to force and to mould the cleverness that comes to it; and its influences and associations, various as they are, can yield the needed complement to many halves that are aching for completion. As a scholar at Oxford Charles Bowen "found himself"; but whether his spirit found its other half and its true home there is a matter that will be differently adjudged by readers according to the sentiments with which they, too, approach a biography—often a university in itself. Whatever their sentiments, they will read with profound interest, not untouched by compassion, the letter he wrote about religion in 1868, when he was a hard-worked member of the Bar, to a lady, his cousin: "It is difficult to explain the position of any one person about these things; it generally stands by itself; and at the present day most men who have ever thought seriously on such matters are, perhaps, in a very puzzling position, especially as regards the freedom with which they ought to discuss or proclaim their opinion to those whom they care for." That is, of course, an "economy," the like of which had Newman propounded Charles Kingsley would have let you know. But Bowen, considerate for others, did not place peace for himself among his ideals:

"What I wish for myself," he goes on to say, "is more fearlessness in holding to what I in my heart think, than encouragement to disguise from myself what I do think. If I was only as brave as some I know, I should be far more what I should like. My New Year's wish for you is . . . that you may never drift into a worldly way of forgetting that life is too short for the world's ways or opinions or distinctions to be of much consequence to anyone, and that the true heroes of life are often to be found among those on whose fearless advocacy of what they believe the world is making social war. I am not one of such people myself, and don't profess to be, but I know some of them, and would rather be amongst them than amongst their critics."

These rare words, with their ring of revolt, from a future judge are matched in human interest by some verses Bowen the Lord Justice addressed later to another lady, who had written to him, as he thought, optimistically of this world and the next:

"Hermione, you ask me if I love;
And I do love you. But indeed we drift
Fast by the flying, fleeting banks of life
Towards the inevitable seas. . . .
We do but pass, you say, from one bright shore
Upon a brighter! Dear Hermione,
Be glad there is no shadow on your eyes;
But this I know, that all the world beside Seems faint with pain; the rose upon your breast
Is not more full of perfume than the world
Of pain. I hear it, even at your side,
By day and night, the illimitable sigh
Breathed upward to the throne of the deaf skies—
A cry of hollow-cheeked and hungry men
Burning away life's fire for little ends;
And women with wan hearts and staring eyes
Waiting for those they love to come again
From strange embraces. . . .
Such is the shore we float from; for the shore,
The brighter shore, we reach, I only know
That it is night, Hermione, mere night,
Unbroken, unilluminated, and unexplored.
Come closer, lay your hand in mine; your love
Is the one sure possession that will last."

One day Bowen accidentally left his MS. book of verse at the Athenæum Club. "That a Lord Justice—why, he writes poetry!" Lord Bowen felt that even the hall-porter henceforth said to himself. Very good verse of its sort it is, however; enough to make the reputation of its author as a minor poet at a period when minor poetry is greater than it ever was since Elizabeth reigned. Of Lord Bowen as a renowned translator we have a glimpse not to be lost. Into sixteen Latin lines he translated Tennyson's "Crossing the Bar," which he showed to a friend at the Athenæum as having been "made that afternoon in court during the course of a long and useless argument." As the lines represent two or three hours of absorbing work, one hopes, of course, that the argument in the Court of Appeal was as useless as it certainly was superfluous; but let not the litigant who lost identify the date! Judges, Bishops, and Royal Academicians are easily linked together in the casual mind, if only by their common membership of the Athenæum. Bowen's good wishes towards one section of his fellow clubmen is expressed in a letter which he writes: "Sitting at the Athenæum; Bishops on all sides, chiefly Colonial, it is true—God bless them and give them a desire speedily to return to missionary labour." Not to be missed is a description of Lord Chancellor Gifford—"he is like a pious cricket on the hearth, very chirpy." On another occasion, when the judges, re-assembling after vacation, walked in procession, Bowen suggested that they "should be fed on the first day of term, and be given buns on the end of a long pole." Someone said that Brett would not like feeding in public. "Oh, yes, he will," said Bowen, "he is the Master of the Rolls."

Bowen's advance at the Bar was sufficiently quick. But he had to work for it. His qualities as a junior were well tried when he held that position, with Coleridge for leader, in the Tichborne case; and as Attorney-General's "devil" he had work which fitted him for the elevation to the Bench which it procured him. To the rush of the Bar succeeded the tranquillity of the Bench, and Bowen hardly knew if he liked it. In 1893 the Lordship of Appeal, vacated by Hannen fell to Bowen. At first he hesitated about it. "You need do nothing," said a friend, "but assent to the judgments of your colleagues." "In that case I had better take the title of Lord Concurry," was his reply. He was fifty-eight years of age when he reached this prize in a profession which had always dealt prosperously with him. No question but he was widely envied; he was the "glory of Rugby," the "flower of Oxford training," and all that sort of thing. But, once more, it is not what Bowen did that is so significant, it is what he thought and felt about his own doings. "The worst of these learned professions is that life goes so quick," he says.

"You begin one morning to read briefs; you go on reading, with short intervals for refreshment, past Christmases, Easters, Long Vacations, just as you pass stations in a first-class express. Here you look up, and the time has about come for the guard to begin to take the tickets. There is one thing certain, namely, that professional life is not worth the sacrifices it entails."

That is an expert witness and a Lord Justice speaking at once: and the world must enter on a period of reconsiderations, if against that final judgment there is no appeal.

THE STORY OF EVOLUTION.

Pioneers of Evolution, from Thales to Huxley.
By Edward Clodd, President of the Folklore Society. (Grant Richards.)

THIS is a book which was needed. It supplies an unfelt want. And unfelt wants are always the deepest.

So far at least as the sciences are concerned, evolution is now triumphant all along the line. Everybody is working on an evolutionary basis. Even philologists and archaeologists, who often would disdain to use the word, as one of them said lately, employ the method itself in all their investigations. But so complete is the triumph that most people nowadays have forgotten the steps by which it was attained. Ask the man in the street "Who 'invented' evolution?" and he will instantly and unhesitatingly answer "Darwin." He does not know that Darwin seldom employed the term, which is Herbert Spencer's; and that as for the idea, he applied it almost or quite exclusively to the organic world. To correct this misapprehension, Mr. Clodd has re-written for us in his lucid, flowing, and easy style the entire history of the evolution of evolutionism. In doing so he has earnestly striven to deal out even-handed justice to all the actors in the great scientific revolution of our century. He has rendered unto Darwin all that was Darwin's, while assigning to Herbert Spencer, to Huxley, and to the other chief sharers in the evolutionary epic their own proper praise and their due proportion in the total. The man in the street will now discover to his surprise that Darwin did not "invent" evolution; that the idea grew by natural stages; and that if to anybody is due the honour of having "invented" what was indeed in the end the inevitable apprehension of a natural truth, that honour belongs most of all to Herbert Spencer.

Mr. Clodd, however, is nothing if not comprehensive. He begins at the beginning. Following the fashion of our day, he takes us back to the vague evolutionary speculations of the Ionic philosophers. To these, it seems to us, it has been usual to attach perhaps an undue importance. The few unrelated fragments of early Hellenic thinking which have been transmitted at second or third hand as mere quotations in the uncritical summaries of later philosophers, and then twisted by German ingenuity or inner consciousness into a systematic whole, are really too indefinite to enable us to say with any certainty that the Ionians had anticipated, even in outline, the evolutionary theory. You may wrench it out of them, but you certainly cannot find it in them. It may be allowed, however, that in later Greek Epicurean thinking, and especially in the poeticised and Latinised version by Lucretius, we do actually get a clear foreshadowing of the doctrine of universal development. Why, then, Mr. Clodd enquires, did this pregnant idea lie dormant thereafter for 1,600 years? He answers this question in an "Intermediate Chapter on the Causes of Arrest of the Movement," in which he lays the blame of this long retardation of human thought at the door of Christianity. In this chapter, as also in the one on Huxley, there is no mincing matters; Mr. Clodd is not mealy-mouthed; it is evident that he regards our existing creed as the intrusion of a less civilised and progressive Oriental religion upon Western thought; and he says so pretty plainly. The chapter on the arrest is followed by one on the renewed forward movement; and then Mr. Clodd addresses himself at last to his central subject, the history of the nineteenth century evolutionists.

In this part of his work, the portion that will give rise to most discussion and criticism is undoubtedly that which deals with Mr. Herbert Spencer's claims to priority in the evolutionary movement. On that point the gravest misapprehensions at present exist; it is desirable to clear them up, both in Mr. Spencer's interest, and still more in that of accuracy of thought in general. We cannot be far wrong in saying that by most people at the present day Darwin is regarded as having "discovered" evolution, while Spencer is thought of as having come after him and philosophised it. Of course, to those who know the true inwardness of the history and chronology of the movement, this doubly mistaken idea is quite grotesque in its wrongness. Darwin did not "invent" even organic evolution; he merely discovered the great illuminative principle of natural selection. Spencer was an evolutionist, organic and general, before the publication of Darwin's first work on the subject; and, from beginning to end, he was and is an evolutionist in far wider spheres than those cognised by Darwin. But the public at large—even the scientific and philosophic public—does not know or has forgotten all this; and a book like Mr. Clodd's is imperatively needed in order to make it understand the facts at issue. We are inclined to say, on the other hand, that Mr. Clodd a little over-estimates at times the novelty of part of his exposition in this matter to the very small world which is actively interested in evolutionary history. A considerable number of the facts he alleges were already known; but some of them are new, and all of them are brought forward now for the first time in battle array, so as to make Mr. Spencer's true position in the progress of the movement quite clear and unassailable. After the documentary evidence thus marshalled in this book it will be impossible for anybody to deny that both as to organic evolution and as to evolution in general Mr. Spencer had publicly formulated his position many times over, long before the publication of The Origin of Species; and also (this is the newest piece of evidence) that he had planned and drawn up a prospectus of the System of Synthetic Philosophy as early as January, 1858, nearly two years before the appearance of Darwin's epoch-making volume. This part of the book ought to be read by everyone who wishes to gain a correct impression of the successive stages by which the evolutionary idea took definite shape in the brains of more than one great thinker.

Interesting and novel in a different way is the section which deals with Huxley's place in the evolutionary conflict—we say "conflict" advisedly, for he was above all things a fighter. Darwin has gone from us, and his life and work have already been adequately considered in many quarters. Mr. Spencer still remains with us, and a certain perhaps excessive reticence prevents us from saying always all that we would wish about a living contemporary. But Huxley's death is still recent; his life-work has not yet received its critical appraisement. Mr. Clodd's is probably the first attempt that has been made to estimate him among his peers. It has succeeded excellently. Huxley did not, like Spencer, formulate a vast and embracing system of things: he did not, like Darwin, discover and prove, almost beyond dispute, a single important law in a particular science. There is no one great fact on which we can lay a prompt finger and say, "He did it." His work was diffusive, evasive, unfocused. But, just on that account, it needs the more delicate treatment in order justly to value it. It is no small praise to say that Mr. Clodd has succeeded in placing Huxley's position in its true light. He sums him up as the "Apostle Paul of Darwinism," and points out the importance of his pioneer work in definitely attacking the then untouched question of man's descent from a lower quadrumanous ancestor. He vindicates Huxley's place as a protagonist, in virtue rather of his personality and persuasiveness than of his definite outcome. Altogether, the book could hardly be better done. It is luminous, lucid, orderly, and temperate. Above all, it is entirely free from personal partisanship. Each chief actor is sympathetically treated, and friendship is seldom or never allowed to overweight sound judgment.

A word of praise may be given to the get-up of the book. Paper, print, and binding are excellent; and the four portraits of pioneers are well reproduced. Those of Darwin and Huxley are after Mr. John Collier's well-known pictures; those of Mr. Herbert Spencer and Mr. Alfred Russel Wallace are from capital photographs.

MRS. OLIPHANT AS HISTORIAN.

A History of Scotland for the Young. By Mrs. Oliphant. (T. Fisher Unwin.)

IN accordance, it would seem, with the express wishes of many readers and critics, who tell her that "each generation has need of its own books, notwithstanding the existence of much better books belonging to a former time," Mrs. Oliphant has—though, as she hints, with some misgiving—consented to revise and expand the primer of Scotch history lately contributed by her to the "Children's Study" series. Accordingly her little work now reappears in a larger form and type, as a crown octavo of about three hundred pages, bearing the somewhat indefinite title of A History of Scotland for the Young. In a brief prefatory note, Mrs. Oliphant owns to some perturbation at finding herself exposed, through her own deliberate act, to a "most alarming" comparison with Sir Walter Scott—"a comparison which (she adds) I most earnestly deprecate, and implore the gentle reader, even the critic whose part it is not to be gentle but just, not to make." We hasten to reassure the author on this point; unquestionably she disquieteth herself in vain. Not even to the most comparative, rascalliest young critic of us all would it occur thus to institute comparisons with the incomparable. Let us, avoiding the lively but hazardous comparative method, endeavour, in our poor humdrum, positive way, to offer an opinion on The History of Scotland for the Young. That opinion may be summed up in one word: the book is, in our judgment, a respectable one. Less than respectable it could hardly have been, seeing that Mrs. Oliphant is a writer of ripe experience and practised skill, and that she had her material ready to her hand—collected, sifted, tested, and arranged by former workers in this field. But it might well have been more; and this is what we cannot justly or honestly pronounce it to be. The truth is, that Mrs. Oliphant, when addressing herself to "the young," is not in her happiest vein. In the volume before us, so long as, oblivious of the "young idea," she tells her story in her accustomed style, as to an audience of "grown-ups," all goes well; unluckily, the thought seems at rare intervals to recur that it behoves her to frame her speech for juvenile ears and understandings, and as often as this happens, in the effort to be naïve and child-like, she becomes childish and inept. This is all the more unfortunate because children are as keen to detect as they are quick to resent their elders' clumsy attempts to write or speak down to their (fancied) lower level. To give an instance or two of the defect of which we complain: there are few young people that will not promptly discern and condemn the overstrained simplicity of the following passages:

"David, the Duke of Rothsay, was a foolish young man, thinking far more of his pleasures than of his duty, which is a thing many foolish young men do, thinking they have plenty of time to make it up afterwards. But this is almost always a fatal thing, and always the height of foolishness." (p. 80).

"James IV. was, or was supposed to be, a poet too, like his great-grandfather, James I., and various merry ballads which have come down to us were supposed to be his; but you know it is the fashion now to throw doubt upon all such traditions, and the more strongly a man's contemporaries assert that he did certain things, the more sure are the critics, a few hundred years after, that he did not do them; which is a thing I do not myself understand and cannot explain." (p. 122).

Mrs. Oliphant's grammar occasionally halts, as on p. 94, where she observes that "it did not matter much up among the mountains how often one clan or another was defeated or leader killed." Perhaps the leaders of the ancient caterans had as many lives as the cat. Mrs. Oliphant adds, "It was the mutual order of things that they should begin again." Begin what? to be defeated? or to be killed? Possibly the lady means—begin fighting again; the antecedent to "they" may be "one clan or another," and "mutual" may be an undetected misprint for "natural." The italics are ours. Other solecisms occur elsewhere—e.g., on p. 73, where we read: "There are some plants which seem incapable of doing more than producing one magnificent blossom, in which the whole virtue of its [their] sap and growth are [is] given forth."

But why are the Tales of a Grandfather to be superseded? Possibly they may be held to be too inflammatory for the youngsters of the age! They certainly appear to have set Hugh Littlejohn's imagination ablaze:

"I do not know what to do with Johnnie," writes Mrs. Lockhart to Sir Walter in February, 1828, "he has gone quite mad about knights and bravery and war, and when he gets into a passion talks about dirking the offender; in short, you must write an antidote to your book, which he studies constantly. We had a party of little girls for his birthday, and for a week before we prepared wooden dirks that he might arm them to make something like a field of battle."

And just a year later, Master Hugh himself sends through a mutual friend the following criticism of the Tales to his grandpapa: "He very much dislikes the chapter on 'Civilisation,' and it is his desire that you will never say anything more about it, for he dislikes it extremely." Dear little Hugh! "Up wi' the bonny blue bonnet" was his motto, says Mr. Lang, and the very name of civilisation was hateful to him. Well, that was in 1829. And now, in 1897, the little Miss Glumps, of Edinburgh, will shortly be heard sagely discussing "the Celtic re-action" (History of Scotland, &c., p. 17), and the importance of the monasteries as centres of civilisation and refinement. Poor little Miss Glumps! Happy Hugh Littlejohn!

EAST AND WEST.

Cairo Fifty Years Ago. By Edward William Lane. Edited by Stanley Lane-Poole. (John Murray.)

The Land of the Monuments: Notes of Egyptian Travel. By Joseph Pollard. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

The Western Avernus; or, Toil and Travel in Further North America. By Morley Roberts. (Archibald Constable & Co.)

CAIRO has now become so modernised that it is well to have from the hand of a master of Egyptian knowledge a description of the city as it was before modern history set in upon the Nile, and before the country became the common resort of the winter tourist. Mr. E. W. Lane's book was written about 1835, and was copied by his nephew, R. S. Poole, from the original MS. in 1847, and doubtless brought up to date in consultation with the author himself. It is a supplement to Mr. Lane's famous work on The Modern Egyptians, and fills up the blank left in that book by giving the description of the city of Cairo itself as it was fifty or sixty years ago. The historical account of the buildings is largely taken from el-Makrizy's Khitat, but Lane has added comments and comparative statements of his own which nowadays have a special value not only because Lane was a more than ordinarily qualified observer, but because many of the monuments which he describes have since passed away. He was not a trained student of Saracenic or Arab architecture, but his descriptions are those of an acute non-technical scholar who had a peculiar love and knowledge of Eastern life. The book is prefaced by a map of mediæval Cairo, on which the chief monuments and buildings are clearly marked. The first two chapters contain an account of the older capitals and of the history of Cairo up to the year 1847.

Those who are about to begin the study of Egyptian history and art cannot do better than take up Mr. Joseph Pollard's book. It is written in a simple, unpretending style, and though it tells us many things which most people know, it is for that very reason all the more useful as an introduction to the study of the country. Before going out to Egypt Mr. Pollard had for some years employed his leisure in studying his subject and in attending the meetings of learned societies, so that when he reached the Valley of the Nile he knew what he wanted to see and how to see it. The book seems to have first appeared in serial form as "Notes of a Visit to Egypt," and now, being published in book form, is much enlarged and covers the voyage up to the second cataract, with notices of the monuments of ancient Egypt. Mr. Pollard has no knowledge of Arabic, which must have hampered him a good deal in his excursions; but as he had already studied the literature of his subject he did not travel in the darkness of the ordinary tourist. In fact, his book knowledge exudes at every turn, for he constantly has references to Herodotus and Juvenal, and to Sir Samuel Baker and other modern writers and antiquaries, while illustrations are drawn from the Bible with great frequency. To many this will be one of the most attractive features of the book, for the land of the Pharaohs is so intimately bound up with the history of the Jews, both before and after the Exodus, that to English people these old cities and places have a most familiar sound. There is a self-complacency about Mr. Pollard's writing, and an abundance of detail, which may irritate those readers who are not making acquaintance with Egypt for the first time, but to those who come freshly to the subject the book will have all the fascination of a romance.

If these two volumes deal with the oldest land in the world where civilisation was weary before Europe emerged from darkness, Mr. Morley Roberts's work takes us to the newest of new countries, where man is only just winning the fight against nature, and where primeval plain and forest jostle with the encroaching inventions and ideas of this dying century. Mr. Roberts first published this autobiographical account of his struggles and wanderings in the Far West so long ago as 1887, and the present publication is a new edition. Many a man reared in our civilisation has been a cowboy in Texas, a bull puncher in the States, or a platelayer on the Canadian Pacific Railway; but the man who can live that rough life and then return home to put his experiences into good nervous English is rare, and not to be lightly put aside as if he were a mere compiler of books of travel. Here is a record which has all the unstrained pathos of the life of a man who lives from hand to mouth, who throws up farm work and cattle herding in Texas to travel with bullocks in a truck across a continent, to work on the excavations for waterworks, and to labour on the great railway which has now united Canada from East to West through some of the most magnificent scenery in the world. The book is well illustrated, the views "Up in the Rockies on the C.P.R." being especially fine. No novel of adventure can surpass in interest this story of work in the Western Avernus, for every page has the air of being lived, and the "bottom dollar," the tramp, and the stolen rides in the "freight" train have all touches of personal experience such as no fiction could imitate.

MARSHAL OUDINOT.

Memoirs of Marshal Oudinot, Duc de Reggio.

Compiled from the hitherto unpublished Souvenirs of the Duchesse de Reggio by Gaston Stiegler, and now first translated into English by Alexander Teixeira de Mattos. (Henry & Co.)

It is pleasant in these days to come upon a straightforward and readable book written by an honest and lovable woman about an honest and brave soldier, of whom she is fairly qualified to tell us the story; though it be an old song that Buonaparte's marshals for the most part were famous only by their military virtues, and not at all for their private morality nor the urbanity of their dispositions. The poor Masséna, the stable-boy Murat, the trimmer Soult, and the heroic scapegrace Ney (to take them whose names come most trippingly to the English tongue) compare unfavourably with contemporaneous captains even at a time when civilisation had the appearance of retrogressive movement; yet were there men in that motley crowd of map-stultifiers who bore worthily the best traditions of France's always remarkable chivalry. And finest of them all, most undoubtedly, was Nicolas Charles Oudinot, Duke of the Calabrian Reggio.

Happily entering the world at a place and time when what is great in manhood was at a premium in the cosmic traffic, young Oudinot soon found that desire and opportunity pointed to the profession of arms, and, on reaching his seventeenth year, he enlisted in an infantry regiment stationed at Perpignan. This was in 1784, the year of the Treaty of Paris—five years before the myriad particles that made the Revolution whirlwind had taken unity. Very shortly after, his affection for his parents led him to put away for the moment the hope of military glory, and, doffing his uniform at the age of twenty, he sought a commercial opening in Nancy; but proving unsuited to such employment, he returned to his native town of Bar le Duc, known in the subsequent Republican era as Bar-sur-Ornain. Here soon came to him the first wave of that flood of fortune which bore him at length to the summit of his boldest hopes. How he won each successive rung in the ladder of his ambition is faithfully and gracefully set forth in these pages by his wife in second marriage, Eugénie de Coucy, who survived him by twenty years —long enough to tell his story to the children of his children's children.

The book is not a history: it is a complement of history, perhaps more valuable to the modern mind than the thing it supplements. Eugénie de Reggio does not merely record the events of her period: we see them occur; there is no attempt to number the dead during the retreat from Moscow, but as we accompany this woman on her desperate drive from Wilna through Tschimori and Kowno, across the frozen Niemen, by the country house of Antonovo, to Wirbaken, and Gumbinnen and Wehlau to Königsberg, and thence by way of Brandenburg and Elbing to Dantzic, through Zehden over the cracking Oder ice floes to Berlin, and again by Leipzig, Weimar, Eisenach, Fuld, Hanau, and Mayence, back to well-nigh despaired-of France, we mark each detail in this most appalling happening of the nineteenth century.

And although the latter part of the book treats of civil, if hardly peaceful, matters, the pen which has depicted with such ingenuous mastery the commerce of armies lends equal vividness to the tragical end of the Duc de Berri. There is a dramatic value in the description of the last moments of this somewhat fatuous prince which leads one to believe that, if the Duchesse de Reggio does not positively confine herself to fact, she has improved upon it for the credit of her sovereign's nephew and to the enhanced interest of her readers.

As for Oudinot himself, he was brave to folly, a born leader of men in the mediæval sense of the phrase, and a fine fellow in every sense; but a great general he was not. As a man Oudinot must always be regarded as a splendid character, combining the heroism of barbaric ages with a feeling for humanity in advance of his day. The terror of his enemies in the field, he was honoured by them when the sword point dropped—even when he in his turn was of the unfortunate party. The bitter ordeal of the Hundred Days showed his sterling worth at its best. Left without orders by his king, deserted by his soldiers whom he had loved so well, and dazzled by the same light which glared so fatally in the eyes of Ney, he yet kept proudly to himself, and with a rare and simple dignity held aloof from the thunder of battle which had been so long the chosen music of his soul. It is fond labour to contemplate the might-have-been, yet it is hard to dismiss this soldier from our minds without a passing thought of how sorely pressed the Prussians had been after Ligny if Oudinot, and not Grouchy, were head huntsman on their spoor.

For the rest: the English version of the book is satisfactory, although we have seen better work by the same translator: never obscure, it is at intervals slipshod. The two heliogravure portraits of the Marshal and his wife which embellish the volume are interesting, and in the woman's case charming, but one would be glad to know whence they come. Also, for the English reader one or two further footnotes would be desirable; not everyone even will recognise the Place de la Concorde under its Bourbon name of Louis XV.

WALTER VON DER VOGELWEIDE.

Selected Poems of Walter von der Vogelweide: The Minnesinger. Done into English Verse by W. Alison Phillips. (Smith, Elder & Co.)

THE cry against the decadents—Eheu, jam satis!—is gaining in volume. Byron, the witty and tender, is re-enthroned: Mr. Henley has re-enthroned him; Dickens, the tearful and laughterful, is re-enthroned: Mr. Andrew Lang has re-enthroned him. The decadents saw only bad "form" in Byron, and worse "form" in Dickens. It was the distinguishing feature of the decadents—and it has remained the distinguishing feature of such of them as have not passed from decadence to inexistence—to be able to see nothing from more than one point of view. They also were—are—persons of one word, that one word with most of them being "form," a word which, with sportfulness very unusual in them, they seem to have borrowed from the language of sport.

It might not seem at a first glance that the book of selected poems of Walter von der Vogelweide, just done into English verse by Mr. Phillips, is the work of one desirous of swelling the cry against the decadents, but this is so. The dedicatory poem to Walter von der Vogelweide, prefixed by Mr. Phillips to his book, is not faultless viewed as a sonnet, but it is interesting viewed as a protest against what the writer of it terms

"... the feeble rhymesters of our day,
Who sing a love half sickled into lust,
And, for the springs of beauty, grope among
The iridescent foulness of decay."

Mr. Phillips has done his work well as regards editing, illustrating, and—to put best last—translating. It shall not be said that the book is good reading throughout. The section of it called "political" is deadly dull, with the exception of the opening poem, which is one of the hundred best things in German poetry, and is translated in masterly fashion. There are dull lines in the fine poems which precede this section, and sometimes the metres, which are very faithfully reproduced by Mr. Phillips, are, as he terms them, "cruel"; but there are lines here of a rare beauty, and even whole poems of a rare beauty. Crowning merit of the work, the note of the translator is almost entirely absent from it! Lines like these abound:

"Rosy mouth, ah, why so scornful?
Let thy laughter be!
Shame, that that which makes me mournful
Should give joy to thee!"

The following is a poem complete:

"A KISS FROM ROSY LIPS."

"Oh! would my dearest mistress but consent
To go with me and gather roses ever,
I'd fill the hours with such sweet argument
That not all time our bond of love should sever;
If from her rosy lips that so enchant me
One kiss she'd grant me,
A bliss more perfect I would ask for never."

Here is the minnesinger anticipating Goethe's Gretchen:

"A straw it is that gladdens me:
It says that I shall win my wooing;
The blade I measured carefully,
As I had seen the children doing.
Will she be kind? Now hark to what it saith:
'She will, she won't, she will, she won't,
she will!'
Oft as I ask, that is the answer still.
That comforts me—although it needs some faith."

There is a note of humour in that close, and the same note is here:

"She took my offering
Like a young child to whom a gift is made,
Her fair cheeks colouring
Like a red rose beside a lily laid;
Yet though, as if ashamed, her eyelids fell,
She made a courtesy—
That was her gift to me:
If she gave more, be sure I will not tell."

A poem called "Virtue and Charm" is only by one degree less virtuous than it is charming. Wit and wisdom characterise it, and wit and wisdom will be found in such poems as "Comfort in Sorrow" (there is there a very quaint bit of philosophy) and "The Inhospitable Cloister." For the rest, the something ahead of his time that every true poet has, gives its character to the poem called "Woman and Lady," to that called "Equality before God," to that called "The Way to Drink," and to all those dull but very brave poems directed against the abuses in the church. Anger there is sometimes here, but, with one regrettable exception, only anger—not clamour and evil-speaking.

In brief, this book of Walter von der Vogelweide for English readers is of the best things of its kind that have appeared for many years. Its issue almost simultaneously with another book of great interest in connexion with mediæval love-poetry, Miss Farnell's Lives of the Troubadours, will be deemed a fortunate coincidence by students of comparative literature.

"WHOSE LIGHTS ARE FLED."

The London Pleasure Gardens of the Eighteenth Century. By Warwick Wroth. (Macmillans.)

MR. WROTH deals with sixty-four pleasure gardens, of which some two-thirds were opening their doors on any given night of the last century. These he divides geographically into five groups. The Clerkenwell, or central, group was the largest, and contained numerous gardens which, being nominally spas, offered amusements in mitigation of their unpalatable waters. There is still to be seen in Lloyd's-row, near Rosebery-avenue, a house bearing the inscription: "Islington Spa, or New Tunbridge Wells." This place had two palmy periods, the last beginning in 1733, when the Princess Amelia brought with her an incursion of the wealthy. Hard by, and mostly commanding green and wooded views toward Islington and Pentonville, were the New Wells, the London Spa, and the perennial Sadler's

Wells. The original Sadler discovered the original spring in his ground in 1683, and he promptly offered its water to invalids, with an accompaniment of "posturers, tumblers, and rope-dancers." Bagnigge Wells stood on lower ground near the still extant Pindar of Wakefield Inn in the Gray's Inn-road. It had much the same history and character as its rival spas, and the same "arbours for tea-drinking, covered with honeysuckle and sweet briar."

A Marylebone group included the famous Marylebone Gardens, the Yorkshire Stingo, near to the Lisson-grove of to-day, the Queen's Head and Artichoke, and other small resorts. The Marylebone Gardens were really notable, and once attracted Dr. Johnson to see the fireworks of Torrè. But the night was damp and the fireworks were impossible, whereupon the Doctor went near to creating a riot. Fireworks he would have, and he incited his companions to light "the different pieces in their respective centres." But the only fireworks that night were Johnson's verbal ones. Mr. Wroth might have quoted as a set-off to this failure the humorous description which Fanny Burney makes Evelina write of a successful display by Torrè in these gardens.

Mr. Wroth's "North London" group of pleasure gardens included the White Conduit House, where, we are told, "the method of effecting an introduction was for the gallant 'prentice to tread on the lady's train, to apologise profusely, and, finally, to suggest an adjournment for tea in one of the arbours." For the tea-drinkers "there were 'genteel boxes' let into the hedges, and decorated with Flemish paintings. A large painting was placed at the far end of the avenue, and seemed to increase its length." Also in Islington were Dobney's Bowling Green; Copenhagen House, where John Cavanagh, the fives player, was seen by Hazlitt; the Three Hats, where feats of horsemanship and bouts of double stick were the attraction; and Highbury Barn, which was only closed in 1871. Unfortunately, the careers of all these places were meteoric. Whereas Goldsmith found the White Conduit House packed with visitors on a summer evening, Hone wrote of it as "a starveling show of odd company and coloured lamps."

Ranelagh falls into Mr. Wroth's Chelsea group, Vauxhall into the South London group. In the latter was Cuper's Gardens, the site of which is crossed daily by all who come from Waterloo Station over the bridge. Bermondsey Spa, Finch's Grotto, The Dog and Duck, the Belvedere, and many another forgotten resort, famous and infamous, is described and illustrated in these pages. Mr. Wroth's industry has been great, and the lists of authorities and engravings appended to the account of each garden add greatly to the value of his book as a work of reference. Nor is this any bloodless compilation. It makes one merry and sad as it reveals the constancy of human nature amid the flux of shows and showmen. It also provokes envy of that distributed merriment. Alas, that for those twinkling lamps, which focused the gaiety of a district, we have substituted one huge, inaccessible garden at Earl's Court! W. W.

FROM CROWDED SHELVES.

Shakespeare's Richard the Third. Edited by George Macdonald, M.A. Warwick Shakespeare. (Blackie.)

The Plays of Shakespeare. (Newnes.)

Bell's Reader's Shakespeare. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

WE have received specimens of three of the numerous new editions of Shakespeare, whose name is legion, which are in course of publication. By far the most important of these is the "Warwick" Shakespeare, which is a series of single plays provided with elaborate critical matter for the use of the student. The editors throw down the gauntlet to the Clarendon Press edition, hitherto in sole possession of the field, because they make an attempt, in the words of the preface, "to present the greatest plays of the dramatist in their literary aspect, and not merely as material for the study of philology or grammar." And, in fact, literary criticism plays a considerable part, both in the notes and the introduction. Mr. Macdonald's Richard the Third is a very careful piece of work, done with special attention to the needs of students as practical experience has revealed them. The introduction is lucid and well arranged, and although Mr. Macdonald does not go at length into the many difficult problems which beset the scholarship of the play, yet he briefly indicates their nature and their most probable solutions. There is a good appendix on the prosody of the play; but we should have been glad to see the passages of Holinshed, on which it is based, brought together in another appendix. Mr. Boswell-Stone's new Shakespeare's Holinshed is a splendid work of reference, but it is too expensive to be within the means of the average student.

Of the other editions before us, that published by Mr. Newnes is on a small scale, containing three plays to the volume. It is well printed, and goes comfortably in the pocket; but there are some brief explanatory notes hung up in an ugly fashion in the text. The other, Bell's Reader's Shakespeare, seems to be complete in three volumes. The one now sent us takes in the tragedies and "The Tempest." It claims to be "condensed, connected, and emphasised for school, college, parlour, and platform." We do not quite understand the distribution of the emphasis marks. They are certainly not attached to every word which contains a stressed syllable, nor do they appear to follow any other consistent rule. We are afraid that the use of this edition would tend to aggravate the worst vices of the amateur reciter.

Cat and Bird Stories from the "Spectator."

With an Introduction by John St. Loe Strachey. (T. Fisher Unwin.)

SOME editors pride themselves on discovering clever young men. It is the special function of the editor of the Spectator to discover intelligent animals, and he certainly fulfils it admirably. Not long ago the republished Dog Stories from the "Spectator" convinced a wondering world that a dog can do most things that a man can do, and several things that he cannot do. The present volume is no less amusing and instructive. If not so logical as the dog, the cat is a far more humorous creature. Nor is her humour of the frankly boisterous kind, but inclines, as Mr. St. Loe Strachey points out, to cynicism and insolence. We have stories, moreover, of a cat who was a musical critic, of a cat who, falling in love with a fox terrier, put her paws round his neck, and kissed his cheek with her lips, just like a lady, and of a cat who, in imitation, or possibly in ridicule, of a literary mistress, was found with a pen in its mouth trying to write a novel on the carpet. The bird stories, too, will supply a fund of innocent amusement not unmixt with valuable information in natural history. There are tales told of canaries who dressed their feathers before a looking glass, of sparrows who insisted on spending the day before the mirror in a lady's dressing room, of courteous ducks, and even an honest cuckoo, who, it seems, is an underrated bird, and not infrequently "lay his own eggs himself." Most of these stories are told at first hand, though one, which concerns a humorous cockatoo, rests only on the word of a bishop. To some doubtless these tales of birds will suggest a pinch of salt. For our own part we prefer to accord them unquestioning belief; and, if they prove nothing else, they prove the existence of a kindly sympathy between a large number of human beings and the lower animals.

Women in English Life. By Georgiana Hill. In 2 vols. (Bentley.)

MISS HILL has given us a careful account of the public and private life of English women, of their education and their social and political position, both in mediæval and modern times. In her first volume, which brings her to about the middle of the eighteenth century, she is pretty obviously compiling from recognised historical authorities. But she presents her gleanings freshly, and often quotes some racy letter or other document; such as this request from Dame Margaret Paston to her son:

"I wuld ye shuld purvey for yur suster to be with my Lady of Oxford, or with my Lady of Bedford, or in sume other wurchepfull place, wher as ye thynk best, and I wull help to her fyndyng, for we be eyther of us werye of other."

Miss Hill has not learnt the elementary rule of giving references for her quotations, and from time to time she makes some curious slips. Thus the Wars of the Roses had not begun in 1399 (p. 15); there is no evidence that John Donne was an esteemed friend of Mary Sidney (p. 137); Henry Peachman is apparently a misprint for Henry Peacham (p. 153); Queen Henrietta Maria could hardly have brought a company of French players to London in 1659 (p. 280). The interest of the book might have been much increased by a fuller account of Lucy Harrington, afterwards Countess of Bedford, who is barely mentioned. Yet she was one of the most remarkable women of her time, a star of literary society, and the patroness of Samuel Daniel, John Donne, and Ben Jonson. The intimate domestic details of the Verney Memoirs might also have been drawn upon more freely. When Miss Hill reaches the Victorian epoch she is on ground which she knows more thoroughly. She has written a very complete and lucid sketch of the many women's movements of the past fifty years, and she has written it with sympathy and without a shriek. But for an occasional sneer at Socialism, she would have proved herself unprejudiced. We strongly recommend these volumes to all women who study their sex, and especially to the orators of the Pioneer Club.

Bells and Pomegranates. (First Series.) By Robert Browning. (Ward, Lock & Co.) MR. THOMAS J. WISE sets a preface, notes, and chronological table to this reprint of Bells and Pomegranates (First Series) which the publishers have hastened to issue on the lapse of the copyright. The book, which is one of Mr. Shorter's Nineteenth Century Classics, is very nicely done—light and simple and attractive. Mr. Wise is, perhaps, a better book-taster than critic: at any rate, it is hard to agree with him when he suggests that no poem produced during the past fifty years is more widely known than "The Pied Piper," and that there is nowhere "sweeter word-music" than in "The Flower's Name" and "In a Gondola." We admire Mr. Wise's loyalty, but he need not carry it so far. Browning has better things than sweet word-music and immense vogue.

Sophocles and Shakespeare. By Lionel Horton-Smith, B.A. (Macmillan & Bowes.)

THIS is the essay to which was awarded the Members' Latin Essay Prize at Cambridge in 1894, and is decidedly more interesting as a contribution to the literature of criticism than most productions of its kind. Indeed, it is almost a pity that the obscurity of a dead language veils it from the average English reader. The contrast between the conditions under which Sophocles and Shakespeare were acted is carefully drawn out. The religious origin of the Greek drama, the continual presence of the chorus with the consequent exclusion of soliloquy, the impediments to action as opposed to dialogue and narrative, all combine to differentiate the Athenian from the English play, even though, as Coleridge has pointed out, the function of Shakespeare's jesters corresponds in some measure with Sophocles' chorus: "Non sane ea sunt dignitate qua chorus antiquus," writes Mr. Horton-Smith, "sed, chori antiqui instar, discriminis potius spectatores quam actores, iudicium eo rectius de re facere possunt, quia minime in actorum discrimen illati sunt." The essay is well provided with synopsis and index, and fortified as well with references.

FICTION.

Miriam Cromwell—Royalist: a Romance of the Great Rebellion. By Dora Greenwell McChesney. (Blackwood.)

MISS MCCHESENEY is to be congratulated upon the success with which she has treated the problem of divided loyalties. But she has done more: she has discovered a hero, and a worthy hero, in the dear daredevil Rupert, who, so far as we can call to mind, has never yet played in fiction the leading part which was his in fact. A mere accident brought him, in the disguise of one of the Elect, into relations with Miriam, niece of Oliver Cromwell, living in the Puritan household of her guardian, Master Endicott. A shrewd blow from a bough loosed his locks from the steeple-crown, and with a bump on his forehead and a laugh in his eye he sat in the saddle a Cavalier confessed. Miriam was a good girl, but she was terribly tempted with wandering thoughts at sermon time. The touch of romance, and the scarlet sash he gave her, "the colours of my King," set ablaze the loyalty that was in her blood. Accident made her the bearer of a royal despatch to the Prince, and under his escort she rode on to Oxford, the King's headquarters. The feverish gaiety of the Court is skilfully suggested, in the midst of which moves, almost silent, full of harassment and hesitations, the pale figure of the White King, like an opal set about with rubies. Various strands are tangled about the central interest of Miriam's love for Rupert and Rupert's devotion to the King. The author handles them all firmly and tenderly; and the human sympathy with which she is filled preserves her always (except, perhaps, in her treatment of a conventional Popish intriguer) in the fairway of historical impartiality. Yet she has her philosophy, we judge: for the betrayal of Strafford is her prologue, and the book closes with a dignified announcement of the regicide. Her narrative style is, on the whole, strong in restraint; and in colloquial passages a suggestion of archaism is made to suffice; but we have our doubts about the "bar" of the bookmaker in the mouth of a Cavalier.

The Borderer. By Adam Lilburn. (Smith, Elder & Co.)

FRATERNAL jealousy, that classical motive, is employed once more by Mr. Lilburn in the novel before us as a spring of action. Paul Riddell is a type of the vigorous Northerner, strongly developed upon the spiritual side; and the rugged bulk of the Cheviots forms an appropriate background to the action of which he is the centre. Contrasted with him is his younger brother, Will, his father's favourite, with a taste for town pleasures and in perpetual straits for money. The spiritual pride which wrapped Paul about as with a garment is in the course of the story torn from him. For the love of his cousin May he suffers the discredit of a supposed robbery to drive his brother, who is his rival in her affections, from the house. Then, having married the girl, he tastes the bitterness of successful treachery, while she cherishes in secret her love for the exile. When at last she has learned that by a word the man who is now her husband could have preserved her lover to her, she drives him away from her in anger, and an opportune railway accident gives her convincing reason for supposing herself free. At this time the exiled Will, or all that remains of him, drags himself back, and loafs about the place, till the last spark of the old love is extinguished in her; while the affection for her husband, which she had never quite put away, grows warm and ripens. In due time the fates give him back to her, making at the same time appropriate provision for "Uncle Will." There is ingenuity in the construction, the central figure at least is fairly realised, and about more than one of the minor characters there are flashes of a pleasant humour; but there was room for further compression and a remorseless blue pencil directed against the obvious and the commonplace.

The Black Mass. By Frederic Breton. (Hutchinson & Co.)

The Black Mass is well named, well conceived, well written. The book possesses, to employ a frequently misused word, atmosphere, induced not by laboriously wrought descriptions, but by subtle suggestion. To mingle effectively the strange, the weird, the uncanny, with the commonplace and the conventional, is not easy; generally, the result lacks the flavour of the one, the actuality of the other. But to achieve the easy is no achievement. Mr. Breton divides his story into three parts: "Out of the World," "In the World," and "Beyond the World." In the treatment of the first especially the author's talent finds full scope. "God dwells not within our forest," says Elsa, the heroine, to young Raymond Eager when chance—or is it destiny?—leads him to the remote Fürsthaus where she and her father, the Ritter von Geroldseck, live, alone with nature and the beasts of the wood. As we read, we, too, come to feel the truth of her words. From the Schloss Wolfenheim, whose master has dedicated his life to the devil, and works strange spells, the web of evil has spread until it pervades everything and everyone save Elsa. Over the forest, with its Schloss, its ruined chapel—now the scene of demoniac rites—and its woodman's cottage, broods this sense of mystery, of fate, of the power of evil, the futility of good. Dark legends and superstitions lurk behind every tree, and even the clear waters of the Wolfsbach chant a bodeful song. Although brief compared with Zola's descriptions of the great garden in "La Faute de l'Abbe Mouret," Mr. Breton's work, in its force, here recalls that of the French novelist. There is, too, much admirable characterisation, although ordinary folk are made to converse over-cleverly. Elsa, child of a noble father and a fiery gipsy, is firmly drawn, and, unique as she is, lives—natural, outspoken, naïve, penetrating, true. Raymond Eager, the apostle, or rather the follower of that which is "nice and comfortable," is a faithful portrayal of a not uncommon type: wofully small he is, save when roused to feel and act by some one stronger than himself; never a fitting mate for Elsa. To those with philosophical leanings The Black Mass will mean something more than a mere story, although, very wisely, the author has not given prominence to this side of his work. On the last page a note informs the reader that the drama was enacted in real life, that the author heard it from the lips of one of the actors at Kreuzdorf: a fact which, in the opinion of some, will add value to the book.

Armenosa of Egypt: a Romance of the Arab Conquest. By Charles H. Butcher, D.D., F.S.A. (Blackwood.)

CONSIDERING that this romance proceeds from the pen of a scholar, that it is built up of materials very laboriously gathered, and that it appears to be a serious literary effort, we are bound to treat it with respect. The time is that part of the seventh century when the forces of New Rome, wearied by a seven years' war in the East, were called upon to confront the armies of the Prophet; the place, Egypt, where two remarkable men respectively championed the Christian and the Moslem cause. George, the son of Mennas, the Emperor's representative, is the centre of Dr. Butcher's interest; his personal fortunes amid the intrigues of Melchites and Monophysites, and the fortunes of Armenosa, his daughter, plighted to Marcus, sought on behalf of the Augustus, ravished from her convent by the young Jew, Reuben, rescued by the Arab Amr and sought in marriage by him (we are assured that she was a young person of considerable attractions), form the staple of the present tale. Also military operations are reported, and a famous siege is described. But though we are conscious that there is on the author's part a strenuous attempt to actualise these events, to convince the reader that his people are of flesh and blood, with thoughts, impulses, and tendencies, they still hover, pale ghosts, on the further side. Either Dr. Butcher's pen lacks the magic power to perfect their materialisation, or we must plead guilty to a sad insensibility. We would almost prefer to believe ourselves in fault (if such a thing were in any way conceivable), for it is grievous that an author so interested in his work and so painstaking as Dr. Butcher evidently is, should appeal to us in vain for sympathy.

A Bit of a Fool. By Sir Robert Peel, Bart. (Downey & Co.)

SIR ROBERT PEEL, as An Engagement proved, writes with facility—with too great facility, or, at any rate, with too little reserve. It is difficult to understand why A Bit of a Fool has been published. As a realistic study of the vicious circles through which Horace Mannes passes, it is superficial, overdrawn, here and there melodramatic. Yet as such a study we must surely regard it, or why the incessant dwelling upon subjects which, to say the least, are unpleasant? One or two quotations will indicate sufficiently the drift of the book. On p. 4 the hero, then fourteen, who tells his own story, alludes thus to his father's governess: "But most women kissed me on the cheek or forehead. Miss Tennant was different; she kissed me full on the mouth, and made a kind of shiver go through me. I think I liked it." Later, when the lady has angled unsuccessfully for the hand of the rich widower, this is the way she makes advances to his weak-kneed heir: "She looked at me with inscrutable eyes for a moment, then, clasping me violently about the neck, drew me towards her, and bit my lip till I could have cried out." Again, we find Lord Padshaw, an elderly peer, "carrying on" with a girl of fourteen, whose "carriage was seductive." Terms such as "sultry," "scorcher," "leg-shows," "full kisses," and the like are not infrequently used; and we can hardly agree with the hero when, towards the end, he assures us that he "had not yet lost all sense of propriety." Manners's final assumption of respectability is a poor climax to an unsavoury and rather meaningless story, against whose tenour we must protest. By the way, Sir Robert Peel might with advantage substitute in the circumstances for under the circumstances, and use the comparative instead of the superlative in phrases such as she "was getting the best of me."

FROM A READER'S NOTE-BOOK.

FOR few novels has there been a steadier demand than John Halifax, Gentleman, which year in and year out since 1856 has sold well in the expensive six-shilling form. About eighteen months ago Messrs. Hurst & Blackett reduced the price to three shillings and sixpence, and now I see that a cheap reprint is promised. The secret of the permanent popularity of this book—which the Spectator truly enough dubbed "a novel of second class"—lies in its perfect suitability for middle-class family reading. Many readers are far from altogether approving of Mr. Halifax, who belied the promise of his boyhood in several ways; still, his adventures contain thoroughly wholesome lessons for the rising generation, and they are not too tiresomely obvious. John Halifax is not Miss Mulock's best book. This I take to be A Noble Life. At first, John Halifax must have made an altogether unusual impression, as one constantly comes across copies of the three-volume issue which was given in the fifties as presents. During a temporary craze for first editions I picked up a beautifully clean copy of John Halifax for a pound. Subsequently, feeling convinced that the prices fetched by unillustrated first editions were artificial, I sent it and a number of Merediths, George Eliots, &c., to Sotheby's. The prices realised were peculiar, for whereas £9 10s. was bid for Adam Bede, I had to buy in John Halifax for nineteen shillings. On the same occasion (this was in 1888 or 1889) an uncut copy of Stevenson's Treasure Island (six-shilling issue) sold for eighteen shillings.

PARIS LETTER.

(From our French Correspondent.)

HEAVEN be praised, it is not a lack of literary schools the latter-day Parisians can complain of. Symbolism itself is now pronounced "Vieux Jeu," and if we thought to have buried naturalism and dethroned its arch-priest, the illustrious M. Zola, it has sprung up recently in a younger growth of the same root, under a refined name of an elegant meaninglessness: Naturism. "Les Jeunes" used to mean MM. Hervieu, Rosny, Léon Daudet, Maurice Barrès, and Count Robert de Montesquiou. These now take rank with the middle-aged, and may be supposed to have sown their literary wild oats; they have, alas! tampered grossly with their reputation for eccentricity, and comparatively "ranged themselves." A new school of "Jeunes" now clamours for our attention. Twenty is the correct age for immortality. It is only the young men of twenty who possess the divine afflatus; they alone are adequately gifted for expressing the yearnings of the hour, hymning its triumphs and beauties and solving its riddles.

They have their manifesto, the innocents, and form a naïve circle of mutual admirers; are, as M. Gustave Larroumet describes them, "a syndicate for mutual admiration." Their names, unfamiliar for the present, are the great names of to-morrow; and each lends a brotherly hand to the other as they march upward to the attainment of collective glory. The four masters of this school are: MM. Michel Abadie, André Gide, Maurice Le Blond, and Paul Fort; their self-constituted trumpeter, M. Saint-Georges de Bouhéliér.

The object of the "école naturiste" is to win French taste from the depraving influences of foreign literature, especially from admiration of the Russian, German, and Scandinavian masters. These five geniuses of twenty modestly rise "in a solemn shudder," and propose to offer to their country "the fortifying spectacle of a French renaissance." Here is part of M. de Bouhéliér's declaration in the name of his school:

"For the last two or three thousand years writers only appeal to the public to expose crimes, the most tragic conflicts of the world, infinitely melancholy adventures, with which they seek to touch us to tears. It is a vulgar enough art. But at a period of profound repose we need peaceful poets. As a matter of fact, this is what we are. The literature to which many young men are vowed remains infinitely violent, resplendent, and happy. M. Michel Abadie has given us in his poems sonorous and beautiful models. The charm of M. André Gide is bred of these same sentiments. His is a tender and ardent genius, of a passionate suavity. M. Maurice Le Blond has given us great pages of a singular purity. M. Paul Fort has written clear hymns. Thus a whole youth rises in a solemn shudder. Reawakening of the national spirit, worship of earth and heroes, preservation of civic energies—these are the sentiments that constitute in contemporary youth a character so singular, so unexpected, and admirable."

Victor Hugo was known at twenty as "the sublime child," so that these four obscure young men may be the geniuses M. de Bouhéliér depicts them, and the gross world be all unconscious of their existence. The "charm of vehemence," which the new "Jeunes" profess to adore, is at best a doubtful charm, and when we find that their so-called progress is retrogression, and that Zola is their high priest and master, it may be asked if the change from "naturalism" to "naturism" is much of a change after all. They desire to depose Ibsen and return to Zola, replace Nietzsche by Diderot, and Wagner by Jean Jacques. "Let us return to nature," they shout, "to simplicity and clarity." By all means, but it certainly is not the author of Pot-Bouille who will help them to this desirable end. As opposed to the incoherence and frenzy of the German school, the chief of the "naturistes" notes the extreme harmony of Zola's manner, and confesses he feels no disgust whatever of the miserable obscenities of these wearisome novels:

"How much we prefer the violent voluptuousness, the shamelessness of a rustic and robust heroine, the ardent frescoes on which are spread Zola's great crowds to Ibsen's homilies. . . . By means of such figures we have known that the terrestrial world nurses eternal heroes, who dream darkly on the mountain flanks," &c., &c.

While M. de Bouhéliér is flinging the manifesto of an unsuspected school in the teeth of amused Paris, another "Jeune," also of the requisite age for reform of an imperfect world (twenty), M. Ernest La Jeunesse, takes writers of fifty to task. Having informed the dreary experienced sages that youth had had enough of them, and is henceforth resolved to write its own literature, rich in all the pleasing imperfections of its years, to-day he offers a marvellous evidence of impertinence and irreverence in his audacious book, L'Imitation de Notre Maître Napoléon. Ernest La Jeunesse and Napoleon are, it appears, kindred spirits, affinities in the old-fashioned phrasing. At twenty the master seems to have had more of the modesty of genius than is apparent in his turbulent and prodigiously impudent disciple.

A more diverting figure still is a scribbling countess, the author of several unknown books, one of which, it appears, was called Mon Ange. The lady is the niece of Count Pelegrini de Rossi, who married Sontag, and was assassinated at Rome. Mme. de Rossi appeared yesterday in the police-court on the charge of robbery. This is a copy of the lady's note to the "Juge d'Instruction" after her arrest: "Charming little Judge, give me my liberty to-morrow, Wednesday; I will love you all my life, for my imprisoned hens and cats are dying of hunger and my youth of sorrow. MON ANGE." The lady appears to be sixty at least. In another dainty missive she informs the magistrate that his sweet physiognomy recalls the image of her handsome and smiling father, who would never refuse a favour to a woman of such distinguished merit as the author of Mon Ange. She promises to immortalise him in her next work. But the Judge remained obdurate, and missed the occasion of going down to posterity upon an angel's plume.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

The Pall Mall Gazette says:—"The first cartographical work published for the New Year. The maps are clearly drawn and printed, and all the boundaries affected by recent treaties or political developments are carefully marked. This atlas will be found most useful for immediate reference, and the statistical survey is a great acquisition."

The Scotsman says:—"Invariably clear and legible and printed with exceptional neatness. For a book containing so much information the volume is of unusually handy size—useful for anybody who needs to have constantly at hand a trustworthy and manageable storehouse of geographical and statistical details."

THE FOUNDATIONS of SUCCESS. A Plea for Rational Education.

By STANLEY DE BRATH, M.Inst. C.E.

The aim of this book is to make a practical suggestion towards supplying the admitted demand for Systematic Secondary Education by showing the natural principles on which it should be based. These principles, underlying all sound thought, are the "Foundations of Success" for individuals and nations.

The Times says:—"The author of this vigorous and stimulating little volume is of opinion, which is probably shared by most people who have given serious attention to the subject, that the system of secondary education at present in vogue in this country is very imperfectly adapted to the real conditions of modern civilisation, and to the highest needs of modern culture. Inquiry and discussion have probably done all that could be expected of them, and so far it is not much. There remains the path of experiment to be tried, and though we should hesitate to endorse all Mr. De Brath's views, we wish him well in his enterprise."

PSYCHOLOGICAL METHODS of TEACHING and STUDYING LANGUAGES.

FRENCH SERIES.

By VICTOR BÉTIS, Director of the Norman School of Languages, Boston Mass.; and HOWARD SWAN, Director of the Central School of Foreign Tongues, London.

No. 1. THE FACTS of LIFE, idiomatically described and systematically arranged, forming a Text-Book for the Methodical Study of the French Vocabulary. In 3 Parts.

Part I. HOME LIFE—The SCHOOL—TRAVELLING—PLANTS. Demy 8vo, cloth, 3s. Class Edition (in 3 Books), demy 8vo, paper cover, each 1s.

Part II. ANIMALS—TOWN LIFE—SOCIAL LIFE—INDUSTRY—GOVERNMENT. [In preparation.]

Oxford Review.—"A thoroughly workmanlike production, and should go far in reducing the difficulties which all have to surmount in learning a tongue other than that to which they have been accustomed."

Educational Review.—"The plan of the book seems, indeed, a most admirable one; and the other parts now in preparation will, when complete, form with this one an actual summary of all phrases in use in French every-day life."

Specimen Copies of any of the above will be forwarded post free on receipt of one-half the published price.

Specimen Pages and detailed Prospectus sent gratis.

No. 2. CLASS-ROOM CONVERSATIONS. A graduated set of Elementary Exercises for Practice in Conversation. Demy 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. Class Edition (in Three Books), demy 8vo, paper cover, each 1s.

Cambridge Review.—"This work is excellently printed, and contains some very excellent conversations. The teacher will find an enormous quantity of very useful matter here; he will learn how to teach a class, and how to vary his method of expression. If it were carried out, the class would be far more interested than they now are in their French lessons at most public schools. The work is full of life."

INTRODUCTORY.

FIRST FACTS and SENTENCES.

ILLUSTRATIONS IN CONNEXION WITH TEACHING.

BY THE WARDEN OF RADLEY COLLEGE.

THE use of pictures and models as aids in education has recently increased to such an extent that it might appear unnecessary to offer for it any theoretical justification. But the very success of fresh methods creates in some minds a prejudice, and leads others to employ them too rashly and too often. These prejudices will be best removed and these dangers avoided if we consider the broad principle upon which the methods are based. Let us then read Comenius under his second head "Facile," seventh principle:

"Let the intellect be forced to nothing save what it spontaneously desires in accordance with right method."

"8th. Let everything be communicated through the senses."

As to this he says:

"1. Let no stripes be inflicted on account of studies."

"2. Let what the pupils have to learn be so placed before them and explained that they see it as plainly as their own five fingers."

"3. And in order that everything may be imprinted the more easily, let the senses be applied to the subject as often as possible. It is not enough to tell the ears, the teacher must present to the eyes that through them the instruction may reach the imagination."

Now principle seven is expressed somewhat ideally, especially when Comenius adds the reason why stripes are not to be inflicted. "For if the boy does not learn, whose fault is it but the teacher's, who either does not know how to make his pupil docile or does not care to do it?" This may be well enough for archangels, but most of us have had pupils whom we have failed to make docile when we were convinced that the fault was at least partly on the side of the boy; and we have probably found more practical service in Johnson's apophthegm: "With the stick the boy gets his task and there's an end on't."

Still, we have turned our backs upon the old world theories, when the motto of authority was "Sic volo, sic iubeo, stat pro ratione voluntas." Dr. Keate's confirmation class, when mistaken for the daily batch of boys sent up for flogging, accepted their punishment without a murmur. The course of studies was a time-honoured institution: to criticise it was misdemeanour, to suggest alterations flat treason; while the idea of a master thinking it necessary to explain to a boy the reason of his learning anything would have been scouted as preposterous. Boys were taught to regard the action of their parents as above criticism, their wishes as beyond dispute; they were sent to live in gloomy ink-splashed barracks, to eat food barely fit for a workhouse, and to go out in the morning to a back yard and wash at the pump. But now we consult boys' wishes and inclinations to an extent which fifty years ago would have been considered fatal to authority, and we consider their comfort and brighten their class-rooms and enliven their lessons in a manner which some may think impairs the old strenuousness and exactness and manliness of English education. We see, however, at present no sign of failing discipline, nor need we seriously apprehend that the manliness of English schoolboys will be undermined by any sickly æstheticism if, instead of gloomy dungeons and bare walls, they find class-rooms brightened with representations of great works of art or historical incident or beautiful scenery. We may not yet have reached the serenity of days when "love is an unerring light"; and when we need force on boys nothing but what they "spontaneously desire"; but still, the use of illustration is one of the many ways in which in all branches of education, in the relation of parents to children and masters to boys, in the exercise of discipline and the imparting of instruction, we have gradually been making authority rationally understood, and at last gladly accepted if not passionately loved.

But the real justification of illustrations is based not on Comenius' seventh principle, but on the eighth; not on the fact that they make lessons pleasanter, but because they make them better. It is true, of course, that the better a lesson is the pleasanter it always must be. But still, the main objection to the use of the projection lantern is that it is a kind of toy, a last despairing effort of an ineffective teacher to secure attention which cannot otherwise be secured, and to lighten dullness which would be otherwise unrelieved. There could hardly be a greater misconception. If a man is weak in discipline he will certainly find the lantern a snare, and it will prove a very broken reed to the man who relies upon it to arouse interest unless he has secured the elements of stimulus beforehand. If our first purpose, or our chief purpose, in using illustrations is to make our lessons interesting, we shall probably end by boring our pupils, for they can be bored by pictures very easily. We shall be tempted to sacrifice our lessons to the illustrations, instead of rigidly excluding every single picture which does not illustrate naturally and aptly the work in hand and is not actually demanded by the course of the lesson; that is to say, which does not bring out some definite point which could not possibly be brought out otherwise. It makes a crucial difference, not only in our selection but in our method of dealing with illustrations, whether we show them because we think they are interesting and pretty in themselves, or whether in preparing a lesson it has occurred to us that there is this point and that which need illustration. Of course now and then anybody may interest boys if he likes with any pictures or models which happen to come in his way, but when we are dealing with the systematic employment of illustrations as a definite part of our ordinary educational appliances, then we should carefully keep before ourselves the thought that the suggestion of the illustration should come from the lesson itself.

It is this fact which constitutes the great difficulty in the use of illustrations. Ordinary pictures are of little use. We want them made ad hoc. I obtained a picture of Bonn; it shows a dull, featureless street, and a dull, featureless stretch of river. Some localities have no features, and we must not suppose that because some place occurs in our lesson it is necessary to have a picture of it. A picture of the plain of Pharsalia will not help us much; but a picture of Tempe, of Marathon, of Syracuse, of the Acrocorinthus, leaves a definite and memorable impression. It is probably in the teaching of geography and history that this assistance is found most valuable. You may tell boys that coir is used for cocoa-nut matting, and jute for the backing of floorcloth, but how can words explain the appearance of a deodar or mangrove swamp, of a Yakut or a Papuan, or give them any notion of the majesty of the Himalayas, or the shape of the rock of Gibraltar. In a short visit I paid to my old head master, Bishop Mitchinson, from whom I have derived my interest in these things, I found him gathering for the instruction of his little village boys what he calls his "Liber Fluviorum." It is a set of photographs illustrating the courses of all the rivers of England. It may be said that one river is very like another, and so in some points it may be. But even of minor rivers there is an individuality as in the Ouse at St. Ives, the Witham at Lincoln, the Welland at Stamford, and we may search the wide world over and not equal the Wear at Durham. If I may mention a few pictures which during the past term I found gave in a moment what no words could supply, I should instance the Hamoaze at Plymouth, the Wye at Tintern, the High Level Bridge at Newcastle.

It is only just in this connexion to call attention to Messrs. Longman's New Atlas and their School Geography, which supply excellently chosen and most useful illustrations. In English History, of course, every one knows the Student's History and Messrs. Macmillans' illustrated edition of Green's Short History. Many of these illustrations, though by no means all, are definitely useful in actual teaching, but even these leave much to be supplied. For instance, I have obtained from the library of the Dean and Chapter of Canterbury two facsimiles of documents which may serve as examples of what illustration can teach. The distinction of folkland and boc-land is a stock question in our early history. Now we have here, at Canterbury, the actual charter of Edred granting lands at Reculver to the Convent of Christ Church. The charter contains these words: "Ego Dunstanus indignus Abbas propriis digitorum articulis totam chartam perscripsi." It is signed by Edred, by his mother, by the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the whole Witan—and by it boys can realise and see for themselves how land was "booked" under the early English kings. Another document is the settlement between the Archbishops of Canterbury and York as to the rights of their respective Sees. It bears the sign manual of the Conqueror, of his queen, of the Papal legate, of Lanfranc, the Bishops of Thetford and Dorchester—and not least—of Wulstan of Worcester. The contrast of Lanfranc's neat Italian hand and the enormous signature of Wulstan reminds us that Wulstan was the only English bishop allowed to retain his See, while the presence of the Bishops of Thetford and Dorchester reminds us that Norwich and Lincoln were not yet cathedral cities at all. Again, within the last two months I happened to be teaching an incident of Edgehill, where one of the most famous of King's Scholars, Harvey, the king's physician, who was entrusted with the care of the young princes, retired to the shelter of a hedge, and spent the time in study. Two days after, I received a copy of Mr. Yeames's beautiful picture, illustrating this very incident, and giving it a reality which no words could convey.

And so one finds that many, perhaps most, available pictures are not useful for teaching, and many which would be useful for teaching are not available. There are in the Academy Notes pictures like Mr. Croft's "Marston Moor," or "The First Winter of the Pilgrim Fathers in America," which bear most vividly on distinct incidents. In the various illustrated magazines, the Art Journal, the Magazine of Art, the English Illustrated, the Century, I see from time to time pictures which, if I had had more leisure, I should have noted under their proper heads as available for points in the direct course of our teaching; while from the excellent sketches supplied by the correspondents of our illustrated papers material of the most valuable kind could be derived; and for impressing upon the mind the leading political struggles of the Victorian era it would be difficult to find anything more effective than the cartoons of Punch. I have ventured to suggest at different times and places that among the mass of people interested in this question—boys and girls, masters and mistresses—some combination might be formed to notice and select from this material what could be useful, and to communicate with the Museum Committee of the Teachers' Guild, who have already done much useful work in this direction.

My own part of the work has been confined to the application of these principles to our classical studies. If anyone is reading Macmillan's Primer of Greek History, or Oman's Greek History, he can procure illustrations specially selected for the various periods. He can find illustrations of Troy, Athens, Mycenæ, and Tiryns. For the Agamemnon, the Antigone, the Ion, the Frogs, there are numerous pictures of the various situations as given in recent representations at Oxford, Cambridge, Bradfield, and elsewhere. Our range of reading is not very wide, and if some combination were formed we might arrange for all our books some scheme of illustration such as this: for Thucydides, Bk. i.—not a book, it may be remarked, which specially requires illustration—chap. 1, MS. of Thucydides; chap. 4, view of situation of Minoa and coin representing the Minotaur; chap. 7, the Larissa of Argos and map of the plain; chap. 15, Trireme; chap. 24, Epidamnus and Corcyra; chap. 47, the islands of Sybota; chap. 90, fragment of the wall of Themistocles showing hasty construction; chap. 93, the Piræus—plan and picture; chap. 96, fragment of tribute list of Athenian allies; chap. 100, Amphipolis; chap. 101, Ithome; chap. 103, Naupactus, Megara, Niosea; chap. 105, view of Ægina from Athens, and so on. These can nearly all be procured from the Museum. As whatever value these observations may have is derived from the fact that they have been suggested by practical teaching, I will conclude by a rough note of actual experience in teaching Church History. In the first lesson on Constantine I found I wanted, and to some extent was able to procure, representations of the Palace of Diocletian at Spalato, of the Porta Nigra at Trèves, the Arch of Constantine, a bust of Constantius Chlorus, the columns of Maximilian at Milan, the Labarum, and coins of Diocletian, Constantine, and Galerius. But at the end of my period, for a subject which specially needs illustration—viz., the development of Christian art and architecture, the catacombs, the churches at Ravenna—though I know illustrations exist, I could not easily procure them. They are largely in books which are extremely costly, and in any case more trouble is necessary to obtain them than most schoolmasters can spare.

HISTORICAL TEACHING IN PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

THE two greatest changes that have been made during the last twenty years in regard to the subjects taught in public schools have been the introduction of Natural Science and the introduction of History. If the rule that the proof of a pudding lies in the eating may be applied also to intellectual foods, then there is something significant in the verdict generally passed on these two new subjects by those to whom they have been served up. Science is pronounced "a fraud," History "dull." Yet could there be any subject with a more immediate bearing on the obvious realities of life than Science, or any subject of more varied and irrepressible interest than History? To make it "dull" great pains would appear to be needed; but, in fact, the modus operandi is simple enough: select a bad text-book, allow one hour a week for the lesson, make this consist of dates and pedigrees and "facts," and the thing is done.

Yet in Oxford there are now ten to twelve scholarships and exhibitions offered annually for proficiency in history where twenty years ago there were not three. And for these endowments there are a surprising number of candidates of marked ability. It will be found, however, in the case of most of these candidates, that they have been selected for some special training and preparation under some teacher who has himself had the special training of the "History School." So that this mass of excellent work tells us nothing as to the ordinary school curriculum's arrangements or results for the rank and file of schoolboys. What it does tell us is sufficiently striking and encouraging.

(1) The work done by the very best candidates is not merely clever, but astonishingly finished and judicious. One is constantly feeling that it is impossible any boy of eighteen can really be as wise as this boy writes. It seems as if the three next years, the years of university training, have little to add but in the way of widening the range and increasing the depth; that all the ground plan is already laid out. This may be so; but it is probable that these years make real and felt that which has hitherto only been imagined or conjectured; they turn into convictions and principles what is as yet only a clever pose; they develop what might be called the mind's character as opposed to its mere capacities.

(2) There is astonishing variety in the forms which ability takes, and in the individuality displayed. The same theme proves capable of infinite differences of treatment. For the most hackneyed subjects this stream of perennial youth proves a veritable Medea's cauldron. Rome and Athens, Oliver Cromwell and Louis XIV., party government and novel-reading, are not hackneyed to a clever boy fresh from his Livy and Thucydides, his Macaulay or Burke. They point the moral as well as ever.

(3) It is interesting to observe how omnivorous is the mental digestion of youth. It can assimilate and utilise almost any mental food. Out of the most limited, the most old-fashioned, or the most colourless material the mind that has originality and power of reflecting, seems able to build itself up in a remarkable way. It is this receptivity young pupils, coupled with the elastic in and retentive memories they possess, that constitutes a dangerous temptation to the teacher. He is so apt, unconsciously, to trade upon these facilities; to assume that everything is properly nutritious from which the growing organism can extract nutriment, everything digestible which does not defy the eager appetite of eighteen. We want not what can be fed on; but the best food.

(4) On comparing things at the present time with things fifteen years ago, the number of candidates who reach a high level nowadays is a notable fact. The best are probably not better now than the best were then; but there are many more whose performance can be called good. This suggests the reflection that is often suggested by practical experience in education, a reflection which may be called melancholy if it is not to be regarded as stimulating, that a very large amount of unused talent exists. Our educational system has a huge proportion of waste products. Many who are not successful in classics are capable of being developed in other directions. Many have won the highest successes in classics after receiving their original impulse from some other subject. There are diversities of gifts, and there are still greater diversities in the modes in which thinking may begin.

A general belief has grown up that a good deal of aptitude for historical study exists in the public schools, which is now undeveloped and not sought out and encouraged. This belief has led to a joint action on the part of the colleges interested to make the examinations for history scholarships more simple, more uniform, and more accessible to the ordinary clever schoolboy.

Accessible, that is, by being open to boys who show promise, without demanding any protracted or specialised course of preparation, and by defining promise in the most liberal way so as to include general ability or literary faculty or historical imagination, even more than accuracy or extent of actual historical knowledge. But this scheme can never have its full effect and there can never be an open career for youthful historical talent till the teaching of history has become a more methodical part of the ordinary school work; till the rank and file in all public schools are taught history with something like the organisation and the skilled experience that is brought to bear in teaching classical composition and translation, classical criticism and antiquities. This by no means implies that the same proportion of time and energy should be given to the teaching of history as to classics. That would be a fatal mistake. History, except in comparatively small doses and under careful repression of the bad old mnemonic system of instruction, is not in itself a good mental discipline for the young. Bacon may be right in saying its effect on men is to make them wise. But its effect on boys who partake too freely of it is to make them prigs, morally; and parrots, intellectually.

However, history ought to be a regular if quite subordinate part of a school course at any rate in the higher forms. It may be used to give educational variety, to supplement and explain the authors that are being read, to make geography attractive instead of repulsive, in fact, to supply the background of reality which school-lessons so often want. Ancient history, handled in the proper way by a proper teacher, may bring home to the schoolboy that the dead languages were once living; and that "that hated people, the ancient Romans," were flesh and blood, and not shadows of the delectus and the grammar. But still more important, though still more indirect, is the value of English history. It can be used to emphasise the human side, which is otherwise so neglected in our school education; to stimulate the imagination, which awakes so late in the average English boy; to inculcate a reverence for the past and a sense of the continuity of national life; above all, to inspire that elevation of spirit which, as Burke said, breathes in the annals of the English race.

What can be done by the right method and the right man is already shown by the gulf that there is between the papers sent in by the best schools and those sent in by the worst, in the Oxford and Cambridge certificate examinations. This gulf used to be even wider than it is. For the great growth of historical studies in England has produced a great choice of text-books, often excellent, and always far superior to those grotesquely bad manuals which were common in England twenty and even twelve years ago, and doubtless are still flourishing, like the green bay tree, in Colonial schools. As Plato put it, they did not merely lie, but they lied in their soul. Their whole conception of history was bald, false, vulgar. But at the best, the text-book is the dry bones, which the teacher has to invest with flesh and with spirit. There is another evil which seems to be still common.

It is the dictating to a class, in a wooden sort of way, of wooden notes, to be taken down verbally, and got up by rote. It is a familiar rule that a man cannot teach well unless he has much more in reserve, as it were, than that which he brings out. Nowhere is this hard saying so true as in the teaching of history. The selection, therefore, of even the very best of text-books is only the first step. "The best in this kind are but shadows." They require filling up, so to speak, by apt extracts from the contemporary literature of the period, and by reference to the best passages of modern English writers. These extracts and these references the teacher himself will have to provide. Furthermore, in his oral lectures he will have to give clear definitions of technical terms; to explain misconceptions likely to arise; to display and demolish lurking fallacies; to exemplify the handling of single questions vertically downwards through the period; to suggest other similar questions and indicate an outline of their treatment; to quote and criticise the various modern views that have been held about the men and motives of the time; above all, to give practice in the writing of short essays, terse, clear, and strictly to the point, and to criticise rigorously the style and the "plots" of these essays, and occasionally to set groups of questions to be answered in a given time limit.

All this, it may be urged, requires an able man, assumes that he has some experience in teaching, and demands that he should have made a special and, indeed, an enthusiastic study of his subject. Certainly; and this is just what we have a right to expect of men who stand at the head of a profession, particularly when it is that great profession of education, a profession the social and political importance of which is even now only beginning to be recognised in England. As a plain matter of business, the cost of a public school education, and the value of the prizes open to schoolmasters, make it no injustice to the British parent to say that he expects to get a good article for his money's worth. There are some signs that the teaching of history in schools is beginning to attract attention, and that steady improvement may be looked for. But some of the first steps appear likely to be based on a zeal which is not according to knowledge. For example, it can hardly be doubted that the growing tendency to make boys work minutely at constitutional history is a mistake. Constitutional history is excellent training for more adult minds; but there is a kind of "wild justice" in boys' condemnation of it as "dry"; it is too abstract for them; it requires a previous knowledge which they cannot possess of the ordinary events of history; it is bound up with legal and religious problems and ideas which are hardly within their ken; and, most fatal objection, it is capable of being "crammed" by these young ostriches.

The aspects of history to which boys take most naturally are military history, geographical, literary, and, above all, biographical. And these are what will best enchain their attention and rouse their imagination. There is for a young student, and perhaps for an elder one too, more of the full spirit of the Middle Ages to be got from Joinville's Vie de St. Louis than from the most penetrating disquisition by Luchaire or the most accurate epitome by Lavisse.

It would be quite possible to maintain, and by no means as a mere paradox, that the whole teaching of history to the young has been begun at the wrong end: it has begun with the abstract and the remote, it has been done through books, and it makes large demands on faith; whereas it should begin with the concrete, the palpable, and the near; it should be done mainly by oral explanations of existing facts; it should convince the reason, and make itself acceptable by making the present intelligible. Something in this direction has been already attempted in foreign countries; nor is it a greater revolution in method than has been effected before our eyes in the kindergarten system. But it would be too much even to attempt such an experiment in England yet awhile; and certainly too much to try to elucidate it at the close of a paper intended to be immediate and practical in its scope.

ARTHUR L. SMITH.

A NEW DEPARTURE.

THE USE OF MODELS IN SCHOOLS.

It is a matter for surprise that, with all the progress which has been made during recent years in the promotion of exact knowledge in the departments of classical and mediæval antiquities, practically no steps have hitherto been taken to illustrate and interpret history by means of models. Praiseworthy energy, it is true, has been shown of late in producing illustrations in the shape of plans, engravings, photographs, and the like, but little or nothing has been done to enable museums and educational institutions to procure actual facsimiles of the objects that come most frequently and most prominently under consideration in the course of classical and historical study. Such facsimiles manifestly would convey far more definite and realistic impressions than can be given by any drawings or representations on paper. In the conviction that there is here a distinct want to be supplied and a good work to be done in the interests of education, it has been proposed to provide for the manufacture of models of this nature. Announcements concerning this undertaking will be made from time to time in the ACADEMY. It is intended to execute in the first instance a series of military models, composed mainly of soldiers and siege-engines. Later, it is proposed to proceed further and to deal with naval equipment, architecture, and so forth. In the military models the men will be made of metal; the engines, which will be working-engines, of wood and metal combined where that was the case in the originals; and the whole series will be carried out on the same scale. Several antiquaries and classical and mediæval specialists, of authority and eminence, have given, or promised, their assistance, and no pains will be spared to ensure absolute accuracy in details and also finished workmanship. The cost will be kept as low as is consistent with the standard of excellence indicated, and will naturally depend on the extent to which the public schools and museums of the country respond to the invitation to support the enterprise. The subjoined list of models already in hand, or in preparation, though of course it must not be regarded as exhaustive, will give some idea of what is in immediate contemplation. Figures: Greek Soldiery—Hoplite, semi-heavy-armed soldier of Iphicrates, Pelast, Macedonian Phalangites; Persian Foot-soldier (temp. Xenophon); Roman Soldiery—Legionary (a throwing the pilum; b using the gladius), Legionary Centurion, Aquilifer, Signifer, Vexillarius, Bucinator, Tubicen, Light-armed Spear-man, Slinger, Cavalry-soldier, Prætorian Guardsman, Centurion of Prætorian Guard; Gaulish Foot-soldier (temp. Caesar); British Warrior; Anglo-Saxon Warrior; Viking; Huscarl of Harold II.; Norman Horse-soldier (1066); Norman Foot-archer (1066); Man-at-arms (temp. Henry II.); Arbalester (temp. John); English Knight (temp. Cressy); do. (temp. Agincourt); do. (temp. Wars of the Roses); English Archer (temp. Agincourt); English Bill-man (15th cent.); Genoese Crossbowman (temp. Cressy); Scottish Spear-man (temp. Edward I.). Roman Military Engines, &c.—Catapulta, Ballista, Scorpio, Onager, Musculus, Vineæ, Testudo Arietaria, Pluteus (various forms), Falx Muralis, Agger, Turris Ambulatoria.

THE HEAD MASTERS' CONFERENCE.

SOME RANDOM COMMENTS.

By far the most important topic discussed by the Head Masters' Conference, held at Rugby on December 22 and 23 last, was the proposed Secondary Education Bill. The unsatisfactory state of higher education in England dates, as has been pointed out by Mr. Rashdall in the English Historical Review, from the wholesale destruction of grammar schools during the Reformation; and, owing to various social and economic causes, the evils resultant from its irregular and unorganised condition have been greatly intensified during the present century. The craze that set in some fifty years ago for establishing entirely new schools, instead of strengthening the time-honoured historic foundations, increased the disorder, and also led to a lamentable waste of resources. And when, somewhat later, steps were taken to rehabilitate on a first-grade footing a number of the ancient schools whose endowments had not been sufficiently ample to enable them to continue to attract their old clientèle whom the railways had in the meanwhile come and tempted away to the brand-new "colleges," the latter had found time to make good their footing. The result was an internecine and costly competition which has continued to hamper the progress and to cripple the efficiency of the provincial schools in particular down to the present day. Moreover, there had appeared in education a social cleavage that was unknown in the boyhood of our grandfathers. The local grammar schools which had been good enough for the country gentlemen from father to son from time immemorial, were regarded as good enough no longer; not that the teaching was inferior, nor the grade of instruction lower, but because, somehow or other, the company which had been sufficiently select for their forefathers was not sufficiently select for them. The growth of this feeling might very possibly have been prevented by a timelier expansion of their ancestral schools, a measure which would have discouraged the creation of fresh institutions. Now, however, though the more wealthy of these schools have held, or more than held, their own, many have entirely lost their county connexions, and, so far as that element is concerned, possess merely the honourable traditions and interesting memories which their youthful rivals could not take from them, and must for some centuries yet to come be content to envy.

Before passing on, it may be worth noting that even in Germany, where the spirit of Junkerism is so strong a force, the sentiment of exclusiveness does not extend to education. In the schools "all classes meet on an equal footing," writes Mr. Bird in his Higher Education in Germany and England; "in one of the classes at the Real School I found the son of a butcher sitting beside the son of a count and general in the army, and I casually encountered a Russian prince attending the gymnasium." Mr. Bird's most valuable and suggestive little book was published twelve years ago: we have rarely met with a schoolmaster who had so much as heard of it, and we have never met with one who would even take the trouble to borrow it.

It is now some forty years since Matthew Arnold began to raise his voice in the wilderness and to hold forth on the text: "Organise your secondary education"; and till the day of his death—a generation later—he continued vigorously to preach the same sermon, and to preach it practically unheeded. There has been the less excuse for this neglect, seeing that the leading communities of the Continent, with their highly organised systems of national education, have presented us for many years past with a variety of object-lessons, with the assistance of which we might long ere now have framed an eclectic system of our own, suited to the needs and the peculiarities of our race and our institutions. As it is, the chaotic plight of secondary education in this country would be ridiculous were not the ills that attend it so serious. First and foremost we want centralisation. We want a strong and a competent central authority, composed chiefly, though not wholly, of persons who have had considerable and successful experience of actual teaching and of school management: an authority which would preserve all that is most precious in education from risk of shipwreck at the hands of the local councils with whose domination it is threatened. The establishment of an expert and enlightened central authority would ipso facto be attended by one unspeakable boon: the profession would be relieved of the amateurish and mischievous interference of the Endowed Schools Commissioners, whose meddlesome incapacity has been so glaringly illustrated of recent years in the ruin of Christ's Hospital, and in the insensate attack upon St. Paul's School during the most brilliant period of its long and honourable career.

With centralisation must come organisation. The first step in this direction would be the registration of teachers. As registration, to mean anything, would involve the application of a test, it would probably be difficult and inexpedient to make it retrospective, so as to embrace existing teachers. But after a fixed date no fresh person should be admitted to a mastership, or granted a licence to teach at all, who had not satisfied the authorities as to his fitness both in respect of attainments and in respect of disciplinary and teaching powers. The last consideration would necessitate adequate provision for the training of masters. This has long been a pressing want, and the Head Masters' Conference has now definitely decided by an overwhelming majority in favour of the principle. Training in the theory of education it is easy to provide for; but obviously this is not enough; it is indispensable that it should be supplemented by actual experience in the handling of classes. Either cheap normal schools might be instituted in the large towns for this express purpose, the lowness of the fees being a compensation to the parent for the want of experience on the part of a portion of the staff; or each school throughout the country might be required to receive, as extra masters, a certain number of beginners. One year would probably serve as a minimum period of probation, those whose success was doubtful being tried for a second year, and then either passed or dismissed as hopeless.

Next, there is the question of State inspection. The Endowed Schools Commissioners have been in the habit of manufacturing schemes, more or less unworkable; but, fortunately for their own pride and peace of mind, and fortunately for education, they have not, except upon rare occasions, followed this up by inquiring whether the provisions of their schemes were adhered to. These schemes of the Commissioners, in fact, being the productions of scholastic dilettanti, are usually marvels of educational ineptitude, and, as such, are pretty generally disregarded. Inspection, however, would be one of the most essential duties of the central authority; and, ultimately, in all probability it could be arranged for upon a very economical basis. The trend of things seems to indicate that the secondary schoolmaster will eventually become a civil servant, with the prospect of a pension. As the inspectors should invariably be ex-schoolmasters of successful experience in schools of the same grade as those they inspect, inspectorships might be a means of pensioning off head and assistant masters of a prescribed number of years' service. With State inspection there should also be a system of State examination. For the senior forms, the examination conducted by the Oxford and Cambridge Board for higher and lower certificates might be recognised, or adopted, by the State. Indeed, it would be a great convenience if this were accepted as a general preliminary examina-

GYMNASTICS. A Text-Book of the German-American System of Gymnastics. Specially adapted to the use of Teachers and Pupils in Public and Private Schools and Gymnasiums. By W. A. STECHER. Small 4to, pp. 353, with 309 illustrations, cloth gilt, 12s. 6d. net.

ELECTRICITY for EVERYBODY: Its Nature and Uses Explained. By PHILIP ATKINSON, M.A. New Edition, with a new chapter on the ROENTGEN Rays. Crown 8vo, over 100 illustrations, cloth 5s.
Pall Mall Gazette.—"It is well written, accurate, and up to date."

Scotsman.—"There are many books of its kind; but few more likely to suit the requirements of readers not specially or professionally concerned with its subject."

Daily News.—"Is a sensible-written manual for the instruction for those possessing little or no technical knowledge of a subject of ever-growing importance."

THE EARTH and ITS STORY: A First Book of Geology. By Prof. A. HEILPRIN. Crown 8vo, 6s. plates, cloth, 6s. net.

A Popular Guide for beginners in Geology. It is rich in illustration, and differs from the ordinary book in this respect, that the illustrations are all reproductions from photographs taken in the field, thus making it true to nature.

Glasgow Herald.—"A very excellent little book. . . . If we had to choose any simply written work for an elementary class in geology, and a work which should at once be thoroughly reliable in character, we should have no hesitation in selecting Professor Heilprin's little volume."

Bazaar.—"Have you anyone at home who wishes to obtain, in a pleasant manner, a thorough grounding in geology, and to understand, to some extent at least, the work of ages, which has built up huge mountains or levelled them to the plains? If so, procure Heilprin's 'The Earth and its Story,' which is the best book of its kind at a popular price that we have hitherto come across. . . . As a rule, geological works are dry in the extreme; this is just the reverse."

Schoolmaster.—"Is carefully written and interesting."

THE STORY of the ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH. By HENRY M. FIELD. Crown 8vo, portrait and woodcuts, cloth, gilt top, 7s. 6d.

This volume gives the details of the laying of the First Atlantic Cable, commenced by the author's brother, Cyrus Field, who after forty voyages across the ocean at last accomplished one of the greatest of modern enterprises. The account of the snapping of the cable at its almost completion, and necessitating the whole work to be redone, together with many other exciting adventures on board the Great Eastern, reads like a romance. It is a book that every boy should read.

Times.—"The biography of a man whose name it should render immortal."

FOR KINDERGARTNERS.

THE REPUBLIC of CHILDHOOD. By Mrs. WIGGIN and her Sister, NORA A. SMITH. 3 vols., crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. each.

Vol. I.—FROEBEL'S GIFTS.
Vol. II.—FROEBEL'S OCCUPATIONS.
Vol. III.—KINDERGARTEN PRINCIPLES & PRACTICE.

This work is the outcome of fifteen years' experience and conferences in Europe and America, and being free from the transcendentalism of psychology will be welcomed to all those interested in the welfare of children.

Teachers' Aid.—"This book is full of valuable hints, and we strongly recommend it to all who wish to succeed in training young children."

CHILDREN'S RIGHTS. By Mrs. Wiggins and NORA A. SMITH. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

Athenaeum.—"We strongly recommend this volume to parents and all who have to do with the bringing up of children."

Educational Times.—"We thank Mrs. Wiggins most heartily for her little book, which we have thoroughly enjoyed."

THE STORY of PATSY. By Kate DOUGLAS WIGGIN. Impl. 16mo, 11 illustrations, cloth back, 1s. 6d.

Here we have Mrs. Wiggins's experiences at her first Kindergarten in San Francisco.

THE STORY HOUR. A Book for Home and Kindergarten. By Mrs. WIGGIN and NORA A. SMITH. Crown 8vo, illustrated, cloth, 2s. 6d.

A charming collection of short stories specially prepared for the Kindergarten and Nursery.

TWO GOOD BOOKS FOR BOYS.

tion in place of the many and various initial examinations for the universities and the professions. The testing of the work of middle and lower forms should be carried out conjointly by the examiners and the masters of the school under examination. The examiners also should be ex-schoolmasters who have served in schools of the same grade as those which they are set to examine; and, similarly, examinerships might be used as a means of pensioning. Roughly, schoolmasters fall into two categories: there are those whose strength lies rather in their mastership than in their attainments, and there are those whose strength lies rather in their attainments than in their mastership. This distinction would suggest the class from which the inspectors or the examiners should respectively be drawn.

Absolutely wise were the two points insisted on in the Report of the Committee of the Head Masters' Conference to Sir John Gorst: (1) That the Council for secondary education should be distinct from that for primary education; (2) that in the future organisation of studies the humanities should not be sacrificed to science. Mr. Welldon's rider desiring the Conference to co-operate with the Head Masters' Association was carried by thirty-eight votes to one; and the respect with which the Educational House of Lords throughout alluded to the Educational House of Commons is not without its amusing side. It is one of the many "things not generally known" that only a few years ago, when the Head Masters' Association first saw the light, several members of the Head Masters' Conference were invited to join the management of the infant society in order "to teach its tottering footsteps how to walk." In the common interests of education they did so, but on this daring act reaching the ears of the committee of the Conference, the latter august body promptly issued a threat of excommunication if these enthusiasts persisted in their bold resolve. The enthusiasts, however, though a mere handful, were undaunted, and with the horrors of martyrdom staring them in the face, met, and cheerfully lunched, at the Holborn Restaurant, and (before lunch) drew up a polite but firm declaration of their right and their intention to do as they pleased in the matter. Whereupon the aforesaid committee quietly executed a strategic movement to the rear, and abstained from further interference with the liberty of the free-born Englishman.

Various details, of greater or less moment, were also dealt with by the Conference at Rugby; among which were the army examinations, the dismissal of assistant masters, the School Volunteer movement, the grouping of scholarship examinations at the universities, and the curriculum of preparatory schools. With regard to the army examinations, to our mind the only really grave consideration is the fact that physical qualifications are virtually disregarded for what is after all mainly a physical vocation. Unless we are prepared to allow the head masters to have a voice in the selection, vigour of character we must unfortunately leave out of the reckoning, since that is a quality which can be gauged only by intimate personal knowledge. But we should be heartily glad to see some regulation made by which, we do not say proof of athletic skill, but, what is of vastly greater value, proof of the capacity of bodily endurance, was demanded in the first instance from candidates for entrance to Woolwich and Sandhurst. Every head master knows that the pick of the blood, bone, and bottom in his school does not go to its natural destination, the army. The medical officer at Woolwich is reported as having admitted "that a considerable number of the cadets were not of good physique, were intellectually overworked, and were of anæmic appearance." With rickety and anæmic officers, commanding scanty files of half-drilled and stunted striplings, the kingdom may well feel anxious about its defences.

As to the dismissal of assistant masters, it may seem unsympathetic to say it, but, unless the head master is to remain an autocrat in this as in other respects, he may as well be abolished altogether. Let his office be put in commission, and let guidance and unity, discipline and centrality, and all else that combines to produce the efficient working of the microcosm of the public school, go by the board. Except a head master be an idiot or a lunatic, in either of which events six months' notice will get rid of him, he may be depended upon to deal at least justly, if not generously, with good masters. Candidates for masterships are legion, holders of masterships are many, but good schoolmasters are relatively few. The average proportion of men on a school staff who do their work really well all round, and about whom their "chief" may always feel perfectly happy, is not large. Head masters set some store by their own comfort, and do not add to their other and unavoidable worries by quarrelling with colleagues such as these. Some of us can remember what an unmitigated nuisance the old foundation-master used to be: may the gods protect us against a restoration of anything approaching to that sort of thing! We have to bear in mind, too, that, as intimated above, a headmastership nowadays is not a freehold, as it often was formerly, and the assistant master may derive a grim consolation from the reflection that if the head master can dismiss him, the governors can dismiss the head master. We believe there is only one school in England, the head master of which has an opportunity of appeal against dismissal by his governing body. But that there is necessity for change has yet to be proved. Whatever hardship in the way of uncertainty of tenure may exist for the assistant, exists also for the head; and if a right of appeal were conceded to the former, it would have to be conceded to the latter.

It is not clear whether the School Volunteer movement acts as an encouragement or as a discouragement to volunteering in adult life. We should like to have some statistics as to this. The sad thing about the Volunteer Force is the fact that, socially, it has long been steadily declining. Except in a very few "crack" regiments, gentlemen have ceased to enter the ranks, and it is now even difficult to induce them to accept commissions. Curiously enough the country squire or the professional man is not eager to sit down to mess with the neighbouring inn-keeper or with his own gardener. All this is very deplorable, and if we knew for certain that the public school corps did anything to remedy it, we should be pleased indeed.

Last, but by no means least, we have the preparatory school. In former days boys were sent direct to the public boarding-schools at a much earlier age than is now the fashion, but at the public day schools the original entrance age is, on the whole, still adhered to. Whether the three or four years, which is all that a boy now spends at a public boarding school, is sufficient to give him the full benefit of a public school training is a doubtful point which considerations of space will not permit us to discuss now; but we cannot help thinking that here the boarding schools are at a disadvantage as compared with the day schools. In the latter a boy may usually enter as early as nine, and often does; while some day schools go further, and have attached to them a preparatory school for boys of from seven to nine staffed by ladies, so that a lad may be a dozen years in the same school. That this plan would be impossible of adoption by boarding schools is manifest, since boys would not be sent away from home at so tender an age; there is no doubt, however, that the day schools gain incalculably by securing in their own hands the continuous education of their pupils almost from the beginning.

In conclusion, to revert to the proposed Secondary Education Bill, the faulty distribution of first-grade schools, and the unsatisfactory financial position of many of them, will have to engage the attention of the enlightened central authority, for which every enlightened educationalist is praying. The irregular distribution of first-grade schools is the outcome not of special local needs, but of historical change, of accident, and often, as indicated in the introductory portion of these remarks, of mere caprice. In some parts of the country considerable districts exist in which there is not a single first-grade school; in other parts several are often found in close proximity to one another to their mutual disadvantage. So, too, the distribution of endowments is most unequal. To throw the existing endowments into hotch-potch, although actually proposed in the sixties, only a visionary would now advocate, and no Government would venture to suggest. The alternative must be faced, and many first-grade schools will have to be subsidised from the Imperial taxes, or from the local rates, or from both.

NOTICE.

IN addition to the "Educational Supplement," which will be published from time to time, it is proposed to devote a portion of the weekly issue of the ACADEMY to the subject of education. An article by Mr. J. Churton Collins, on "The Teaching of English Literature in Schools," will be included in next week's number.

RATIONAL EDUCATION.

The Foundations of Success: a Plea for Rational Education. By G. S. De Brath. (G. Philip & Son.)

By Prof. RAMSAY, F.R.S.

VARIOUS reasons have of late led many thinking men to doubt whether the English system of secondary education is worthy of the name of system. Classical tradition still controls our public schools; and in many of them the "modern side" is found not to be a brilliant success, and is maintained more as a grudging concession to the utilitarian spirit of the age than as a proper method of education, using that word in its etymological sense. "Latin and Greek," as a headmaster once remarked to the present writer, "are the most effectual agents in keeping a boy's nose at the grindstone." The statement was probably true, from that teacher's point of view; but only because the teaching of the ancient languages has been methodised, and because it is easier to find persons capable of giving precisely that kind of drill than of giving really intelligent instruction in other branches.

The whole question of school education has been treated in a masterly manner by Mr. G. S. De Brath in a book of some 200 pages, entitled The Foundations of Success: a Plea for Rational Education. Mr. De Brath modestly disclaims originality in his treatment of the subject; but originality often consists as much in orderly arrangement and logical sequence of ideas as in novelty; and this is a subject on which it would be difficult to write anything new. The keynote of the work is that our present systems need reform; that "success in this workaday world (and success here means existence) has come to depend more and more on 'directive skill'—power to direct the forces of inanimate nature, and of less able men, whether in units, classes, or races"; that "instruction aiming at this 'directive power' is largely given in the State-aided technical and secondary schools for the masses, and must be still more widely given in the near future"; and that such instruction "is far superior both in planned order and method to that of the expensive class-schools usually called secondary." He complains that in our public schools, and in our secondary schools in general, far too little attention is paid to the co-ordination of the various branches of instruction, and points out that Germany and America have made great strides towards a consistent co-ordination; that "the one, by patient study of the mental operations, has discovered, and the other, with characteristic keenness, is applying, a new form of 'concentration' whereby, instead of science, mathematics, history, literature, language, and manual training being treated as entirely different 'subjects,' they are linked together, by handling each so as to afford illustrations to the others."

These two nations, which are our two great rivals in trade, are precisely the nations which have revised their educational system; and they have done so in accordance with the fact that the wealth of a manufacturing State lies in the number of producers actively engaged, in their individual skill, and in the intelligence with which they are directed. Yet the two nations differ in mental aptitude. The present writer was much struck with a remark made by the American manager of a very large German electrical manufactory, that while German workmen were more conscientious and trustworthy, American sub-managers were preferable to Germans on account of their greater fertility of resource and energy.

Mr. De Brath draws special attention to the present time as England's opportunity.

"In the last years of the eighteenth century it was Continental war destroying commerce; in the last years of the nineteenth century it is Continental militarism sapping it. Hundreds of thousands of workmen are withdrawn from production, and heavy taxes oppress the trading classes. . . . These facts will not continue indefinitely; the magnitude of the expenditure forbids it. While they last, they are England's opportunity."

Our public and secondary schools are

"the schools for the officers of industrialism, and these are more imperatively needed by England than the technical schools we are now tardily endowing. Wise direction of industrialism is of the essence of the matter. Is it needful to insist that all skill comes first of taking thought? or that directive skill is even more useful than manual skill?"

These quotations show the ground on which Mr. De Brath builds. The superstructure is a careful treatise on physical and biological facts, on physical education, on mental education, on moral education, on method, on the stages of growth, and on the co-ordination of instruction, and a concluding chapter treats of some practical suggestions.

Mr. De Brath does not hesitate to begin at the beginning. Adopting the modern scientific definition of energy, he deals with the transformation of the chemical energy absorbed as food into heat, necessary to sustain the temperature of the body; into motion of its parts, necessary to all vital processes; and into that portion which is active in the brain, the manifestation of which is consciousness. With a short sketch of the nature of variation, transmitted to progeny, and of heredity he passes on to remark that while "we cannot change the facts which have made the degenerate, the neurotic, the hysterical, and the criminal," yet the future of young persons is greatly influenced by their environment, and that "we have only to make a suitable environment for growing organisms if we wish to mould them to our ideals; and this is the meaning of education." "It is environment that has produced variations in the past, as it is to it that the horticulturist and the stock-breeder look to produce those at which they aim; so to it, and not to mere didactics, must the educator look for his results also." And "education becomes the provision of such an environment as will favour the ethical process in the fullest application of that term; one which takes account of the physical and intellectual side of that process as well as of its moral side." The ethical process culminates in "renunciation as the gate of the higher life."

Physical education comes first in order. The use of the body in all its muscular development, so as to evolve skill, leads not only to greater acuteness in the senses, but also to the mental habit of using them. Therefore the child should be trained by example more than by precept to use his eyes in observing natural objects and recording the observations; his ear in musical exercises; his hands in drawing and in carpentry for boys, in dress-cutting and cookery for girls. Such training makes capable men and women; "its lessons can never be learned by precepts alone, they are to be acquired by actual personal endeavour expended on real things." The corpus sanum is next considered, and a number of very practical maxims, gained in the school of experience, are laid down for combating and repressing the evils not uncommon in public schools.

But Mr. De Brath does not confine himself to general exposition; he gives a detailed table of divisions of the day, as in his opinion they should be spent in a school. Each week twenty-nine lessons of three-quarters of an hour each are interposed between intervals devoted to play, meals, and music. Work and violent exercise after meals are avoided, and not more than four lessons ever succeed one another. There can be no doubt that such conditions as these are favourable to the physical health and mental development of boys and girls.

Mr. De Brath defines the purpose of mental education as required to give—(1) habits of close observation, (2) discrimination of likenesses and differences, (3) power of correct inference, and (4) that command of language which is necessary for correct formulation, or for calling up a clear mental image. The "knowledge," which is sometimes spoken of as if it were the purpose of mental education, comes incidentally. As a matter of method, the formulation of a general truth should be reached only through repeated trials. It is interesting to contrast the old and the suggested way of learning that the square on the hypotenuse of a right-angled triangle is equal to the sum of the squares on the other two sides. As everyone knows, the usual method is to give the boy the proposition to learn; if he understands it, so much the better; if he does not, he is a duffer. "The right way," according to Mr. De Brath, "because the natural path of discovery, is to show that a right-angled triangle, of which the sides enclosing the right angle are in the proportion of 3 to 4, has the third side equal to 5 of the same units of length, and that $3^2 + 4^2 = 5^2$; to go on to show that the same relation holds between the sides in other cases, both arithmetically and by actual mensuration (or weighing) of the constructed squares. The general rule can then be inferred; and lastly, we can start with the rule and prove it deductively, as in Euclid I., 47. It must never be forgotten that "words come to a child as pure conventions till he sees the actual things," and the same is to some extent true with most adults. As things are at present, "almost all our teaching is from words, and the retention of words is alpha and omega." But our instruction should aim at teaching not what to think, but how to think; and a programme is laid down in which the two chief divisions are the life of man and the life of nature.

The subject of moral education is next considered. Morality is defined as "the wise direction of the daily stock of energy; wise habits of expenditure of this stock preclude unwise habits;" and character "is that nature of mind which practises wise thought and action." The cultivation of the sense of beauty, of the sense of right, and of the infinite, are obviously the goals to aim at in moral training. The last, which involves religion, is worthy of special care; and it must never be forgotten that here, above all, example is of far more worth than precept—that our religion is our daily life as actually lived.

A chapter on "Method" follows, with details of application in actual teaching. And here we note the difficulties to be contended with. Our Universities, instead of allowing the "Lehrfreiheit" of the Continent, impose restricted courses, and test the progress of the student by examinations. This evil is a great one; and its harmful influence on the prosperity of the country is almost incalculable. For it is necessary for the schools to aim at preparation for the University, and this involves the compulsory acquisition by all boys of a number of subjects, in which many take little or no interest. Our universities also place a wrong goal before the eyes of students, the majority of whom read with the object of passing an examination, or of distancing their fellows, or of securing a scholarship, instead of with the intention of training their mental faculties for their life-work. Especially in science is this to be deplored; for the originaive faculty, and the power of management of fellow-men, is not to be tested by examination. The process leads to the selection of the unfit in a majority of cases, for a ready memory counts for more than ability to originate and to govern. The schoolmaster, however, has to take things as they are; and Mr. de Brath does his best to adapt his curriculum to the existing state of University education. It is time that our authorities in higher education recognised that nine-tenths of the energy which is expended by teachers and pupils in examining and in preparing for examinations might be used with much more profit in exercising the faculty of origination, in which few men are wholly deficient.

The scheme, which Mr. de Brath propounds in his final chapter, for instituting a model school, has much to recommend it. Happy the boys who are under his system!

For comprehensive treatment of his subject, for thorough acquaintance with what has been previously written, and for lucid statement of common-sense principles, which are so obvious when clearly laid down as almost to appear to be truisms, this little work deserves the highest commendation. It is much to be hoped that its influence may be widespread, and that its teaching may be ere long translated into action.

"Science is accuracy about common things," and with this definition, for which Mr. de Brath is responsible, his little treatise has good claim to be called scientific.

SCHOOL BOOKS.

Stories of the Cæsars from Suetonius. By H. Wilkinson. (Macmillans.)—This is another of Messrs. Macmillans' familiar and useful series of sky-blue classics, that come as a boon and a blessing to schoolmasters. The arrangement is similar to that of other numbers of the "Elementary Classics," and includes, as usual, exercises for re-translation. But the little book deserves notice for a special reason. It is quite time that a greater variety of Latin authors was made available for middle-form work; not so much, indeed, for the sake of the learner as for that of the teacher, to whom the ding-dong round of Cæsar and Ovid, Nepos and Sallust, may save trouble, but on whom such reiteration cannot well fail to produce in time a hopelessly deadening effect. Already, however, thanks to this series, even the grizzled and yawning veteran who has done his hundred terms in the third form room may be fired with the burning zeal of three-and-twenty by the elixir of Gellius, Curtius, and Suetonius, and may be further stimulated, we hope, by the prospect of fresh and invigorating draughts from Florus, Paterculus, Macrobius, and others yet to come.

Æschylus: Prometheus Bound. By C. R. Haines. (Swan Sonnenschein.)—It is difficult at first sight to realise the necessity for yet another school edition of the Prometheus Vinculus; but an examination of this book has persuaded us that Mr. Haines was justified in putting it forth. It would be hardly possible to pass it by unnoticed, for the attention is at once arrested by the taste and excellence of the get-up: the binding, the paper, the type, and the illustrations are of a grace and quality that combine to produce a charming little volume. We are not of those who think that anything is good enough for the British schoolboy, yet this seems almost too dainty an object to be mauled by the rude and dingy paws of Smith major or Jones minor, and suited rather to the fairy touch of their gentle sisters in the high schools. One of the above attractions, however, the insertion of scenes and drawings taken from ancient art, is, we hope, a token of the coming awakening to the fact that every educational book whose subject admits of it should be illustrated. In the text, varie lectiones are very properly given at the foot of the page, while with equal propriety discussion on them is omitted. The notes are well up to sixth-form standard at least, and in respect of scholarship we have discovered in them absolutely nothing with which to find fault. The frequent references to parallel passages in English literature is a new departure that is worthy both of praise and of imitation; but we should hardly have thought it worth while in a serious work to fill two-thirds of a page (p. 91) with an extract from Mr. Kinns's Moses and Geology, which is not literature, and, we are told, not science. The allusions to General Gordon might also have been spared in a commentary upon Æschylus. In connexion with the note on ἀφικτον ὄμμα (l. 903), it may perhaps be pointed out that it is not quite certain that "unavoided" in Shakespeare's "Richard III." (IV. i. 56) means "unavoidable"; other passages in the play rather tend to show that it is equivalent to "if not avoided." We agree with the editor in doubting whether his appendix on metre will be of much value for class-work, but it may be useful to the average teacher, if not to the taught. We are also in thorough agreement with him on another point: that indexes are indispensable appendages even to school books.

The Student's Companion to Latin Authors, by G. Middleton and T. R. Mills (Macmillans), distinctly supplies a want. It holds a position midway between the bibliography and the critical literary history. Its object is, as the preface puts it, "to give in a convenient form all the facts of importance relating to the lives and works of the principal Latin authors, with full quotation of original authorities on all the chief points," the authors being, "as far as possible, illustrated from their own works." The notice of each is divided into two sections, of which the first deals with his life, the second with his writings. Naturally, the book is to a great extent based on the History of Roman Literature by Teuffel and Schwabe, but other and more special authorities have been utilised where needful. At the end there is a short appendix on "Some of the Chief Ancient Authorities for the History of Roman Literature," such as Jerome, Gellius, Macrobius, and Servius. To this is added a list of selected editions, brought down to date, and two sufficiently full indexes. The compilers, who have had the advantage of the advice and assistance of Prof. Ramsay, have performed their task with care and discrimination, and the result has been the production of a volume which not only will be found extremely useful and time-saving for purposes of reference, but which can be read with profit and with interest from cover to cover.

Tacitus: Histories. Book I. By G. A. Davies. (Pitt Press.)—This edition is provided with the usual apparatus in the way of introduction, notes, and indexes, all amply sufficient for the purpose for which it is designed—that is, preparation for examinations of the standard of the Oxford and Cambridge Board. The notes, whether touching on history, grammar, or style, are clear, concise, and practical; while textual criticism, except here and there, has wisely been eschewed. In the note on Vexillis (p. 108), "banneret" is incorrectly used—"gonfanon" would be more appropriate, though even that would not exactly describe the vexillum. It is true that in mediæval Latin miles vexillarius is sometimes used for miles banneretus, and similarly vexillum is the word employed to express the small banner (or curtailed pennon) known as a "banneret," which, however, was quite a different thing to the classical vezillum. This is just one of those frequently occurring instances which show how indispensable illustrations are to antiquarian explanations that deal with objects. The ordinary schoolboy, and, for the matter of that, the ordinary master, would learn nothing by being told that the vezillum was like either a "banneret" (which it was not) or a "gonfanon" (which it only somewhat resembled). In a scholarly book one comes with a painful shock upon such a phrase as "the only alternative" (p. 168).

An Introduction to Latin Textual Emendation. By W. M. Lindsay. (Macmillans.)—There is some danger lest this excellent piece of work may suffer at the hands of schoolmasters an undeserved neglect. It is not, as its title might suggest, a tome ponderous alike in matter and in bulk, and as such to be disregarded for ordinary school purposes, but a little manual of some 130 pages. Yet into this small compass Mr. Lindsay has contrived to pack a remarkable amount of material, and that, too, without sacrificing clearness to condensation. Not only will the lad who is reading for a classical scholarship find here much that he ought to know and much that he will not readily find elsewhere, but the subject is treated in so attractive a manner that it would be difficult for any intelligent fifth or sixth form boy to dip into the book without his curiosity and his interest being aroused. For reasons stated in the introduction, the text of Plautus is taken as the basis of illustration. The various sources of textual error are discussed and explained, each in a special chapter, under the respective headings of "Errors of Emendation," "Errors of Transposition," "Errors of Omission," "Errors of Insertion," "Errors of Substitution," "Confusion of Letters," "Confusion of Contractions," accompanied throughout by a marginal analysis. Then follow three appendices; the subject of the first being "The Archetype MS. of Plautus," while the second gives a "Specimen of Critical Apparatus," and the third lays down most useful and practical directions as to the method of collating a MS. There are two indexes (by the way, Mr. Lindsay prefers the form "indices," which we thought was now by general agreement definitely confined to the mathematical dialect). In future editions—and we trust there will be many—a glossary of technical terms might be added with advantage. The book is one of value and importance, and is a masterpiece of compression and lucidity; it should be on the shelves of every school library.

Xenophon: Anabasis. Book II. Edited by G. M. Edwards. (Pitt Press Series.)—There is not likely to be any cessation of demand for Xenophon's Anabasis, and this little edition supplies all that the schoolboy can require to help him over the early obstacles of a Greek author. Mr. Edwards supplies a clearly written introduction on the life of Xenophon and the general outlines of the expedition of Cyrus. The book is also provided, as it should be, with a map of the route.

A Handbook of Greek Sculpture. Part II. By Ernest Arthur Gardner. (Macmillans.)—This is the second and the more interesting volume of a work which Mr. Gardner, as a former director of the British School of Archaeology at Athens, is peculiarly fitted to perform. The period covered by it begins with the age of Pheidias, follows the decadence of Greek art, and concludes with the revival of portrait sculpture under Hadrian. The book is full of illustrations, and written in scholarly, though by no means pedantic, style. The chapter on the Parthenon and the Erechtheum is particularly interesting.

The Cambridge Bible for Schools and Colleges: Isaiah. Chapters I. to XXXIX. By J. Skinner, D.D. (Cambridge: University Press.)—In many respects this is an admirable volume. The notes are clear and concise, and the introduction will give the student a graphic picture of the political situation, as well as an insight into the moral and spiritual state of the Jews contemporary with Isaiah. But Dr. Skinner's statements with regard to genuineness are objectionable. No one should dream of introducing the present controversy on the genuineness of Homer into the schoolroom, nor did classical scholars of thirty years ago act differently with respect to Horace and Virgil. Every one whose opinion is of weight will agree that this is the reasonable practice. Whatever may be the value of the "new criticism," a schoolboy is certainly not the proper recipient of its teaching.

Pope's Essay on Criticism. Edited by John Churton Collins. (Macmillans.)—This edition is designed mainly for the use of students in England and the Colonies, and the name of the editor is a sufficient guarantee of its scholarly excellence. A memoir of Pope and a critical introduction to the essay precede the text, and the notes, though copious, are succinct and relevant.

Blackboard Drawing. By M. Swannell. (Macmillans.)—There is probably no childish amusement which carries with it so much instruction as drawing; and there are, it must be confessed, few parents who are able to direct the efforts of their children in this respect. In this book will be found copious and clear directions which cannot fail to be understood by the most stupid of parents. By a conscientious use of it, and the excellent illustrations which it contains, together with a small blackboard and a piece of chalk, a child with the slightest turn for drawing can be conducted through circles to pictures of clocks, bicycles, fish, fowl, and finally St. Paul's Cathedral.

FRENCH EDUCATIONAL BOOKS.

Le Roi des Montagnes. By Edmond About. Pitt Press Series. Edited by Arthur R. Ropes, M.A. (Cambridge: University Press.)—About was a writer most distinctively French, an incarnation of the clear mocking spirit which reached its perfection in Voltaire, though Mr. Ropes well reminds us that Voltaire had an earnestness of purpose which About lacked. There is nothing to add to Mr. Ropes's well-balanced introduction, save to congratulate him on the fact that the author cannot retaliate. The Roi des Montagnes is a literary gem. The good faith with which Schulz, the botanist, tells the story of his captivity, attempted escapes, tortures, and final deliverance; of the system of brigandage carried on as a limited liability company; the travesty of heroics at Vasili's burial and the funeral oration; the simplicity with which the meek man of science poisons the whole robber band, and Hadji Staurous justifies his cruelties by urging "'tis my vocation!"—is inimitable. The reader thinks by turns of Gulliver and of Barry Lyndon. The style and language are crystal-clear, and Mr. Ropes's notes mark and explain nearly every difficulty. In some cases we could wish the notes longer, and—shade of Wright! why mistranslate "Allah Kerim!" by "God is Great" instead of "Merciful," particularly as the former is meaningless and the latter most appropriate in the passage where it occurs (p. 20)? We should have liked to see a little more etymology introduced, for the parentage and kinship of words cannot be too early taught to boys. The curious distortion of cant (p. 79) to mean prudery, and the queer relationship of pimbêche, "stuck-up," to Pinchbeck, might have been noticed. The whole book, however, is delightful, and is heartily to be commended.

"MODERN FRENCH AUTHORS:" Madame Lambelle. By Gustave Toudouze. (Whittaker.)—Messrs. Whittaker are doing good service to both countries by bringing out for English readers these "authorised" editions of modern French stories. The present volume might bear the motto Virginibus puerisque, and any mother might safely put it into her daughter's hands. It tells, in simple, flowing language, a tale of that honourable middle-class family life, less common in Paris than in the provinces, which is the most winning feature of some modern French fiction. A mother, early widowed by the tragic death of her husband, a martyr to professional duty, devotes her life to the welfare of an only son, who repays that unselfish love with perfect devotion, and crowns her later years with the laurels of his well-earned success. The scenes of family life, the struggles of mother and gifted artist-son, and his ultimate triumphs, completed by marriage with the very cousin whose rescue from death had cost his father's life, all are well drawn; and the chapter on an incident of the war of 1870 is good, while wisdom is shown in bidding France seek la revanche in those higher victories of peace of which she has already won so many. The book is one which we heartily recommend, it is worthy to rank with Hector Malot's delightful Sans Famille, and its interest is enhanced by knowing that some of the main facts of the story are drawn from the author's own family history. The editor, M. Boiëlle, is an experienced teacher, and his notes are short and to the point. Leading principles of grammar are carefully explained, the renderings are almost always happy, and French military, social, and administrative phrases are clearly defined. Of course it is a mistake to call Melpomene a goddess (p. 235) instead of a muse—but even Homer nods!

A Higher French Reader. Ernest Weekley. (W. B. Clive.)—To dip into Mr. Weekley's Reader is like taking a plunge-bath in December—it gives one a decided shock, but is a wholesome experience for a sound intellect, as the latter is a good tonic for a vigorous body. The book consists of about one hundred and forty passages—half in prose and half in poetry, of difficult French. They are well chosen from many of the best authors of the present century, chiefly (for obvious reasons) of the romantic school; they deal in short, crisp, idiomatic sections, with all sorts of subject-matter; and the young scholar who reads the book will not only see the necessity for hard work to know French well, but he will also get much sound knowledge of its best modern authors. The selection illustrates Taine's luminous remarks, in his classic Ancien Régime, on the way in which France, freed by the Revolution from political fetters, emancipated and enriched her language with the wealth of extra-Parisian speech. When this useful book passes into a second edition, we hope Mr. Weekley will make it more valuable still by indicating precisely where his extracts come from; by giving short notices of the authors, and references to the best French estimates of their work; and by adding a few notes.

"MODERN FRENCH TEXTS": Les Trappeurs de l'Arkansas. Edited by Marguerite Ninet. (Blackie & Son.)—This is a capital addition to Mr. F. Storr's excellent series, and the schoolboy is to be envied whose French lesson is made pleasant and interesting by this story of adventure among trappers and redskins, told in easy, flowing, idiomatic style by Aimard, the French Mayne Reid. We have read the book at a sitting from cover to cover, and congratulate Mlle. Ninet on her work. Mr. Storr is right in holding that too many or too long notes are a hindrance and not a help. Idioms and points of grammar are for the most part sufficiently treated; but sieste, dormir à poings fermés, alerte! tir à la cible, and a few others might have been explained. Also, the difference in the use of similar or even identical words in the two languages has not always been noted. Two short introductions—the one on Aimard's life, and the other on the history of Mexico, the hero's home—add to the value of the book. The long-suffering parent will rejoice in its small price—one shilling.

Class-room Conversations in French. By Victor Bétis and Howard Swan. (George Philip & Son.)—A new system of teaching foreign languages, based (as Gouin's Series Method is) on long study, and pushed by a host of enthusiastic disciples, deserves respectful treatment. This, No. 2 of the French Series, introduces the pupil to abstract thought, as the first treats of the "Facts of Life." Constant repetition, very gradual introduction of new ideas and phrases, and careful attention to idiom, characterise the method. The Conversations now before us seem well calculated to give the learner a rich store of idiom and considerable readiness; formal grammar must be sought elsewhere. This is not the place to discuss how far the essentials of "nature's system" can be reproduced in a foreign country. A child learns its mother-tongue in an atmosphere vibrating, so to speak, with it; things and their names get to be known together, and are inseparably associated in the child's mind. It is this fact which gave strength to the reasonings of mediæval Nominalists. In so far as it is impossible to reproduce the fostering native air, any system like the present must fall short of nature's method. In a book of elementary instruction it is scarcely pardonable to print "le Français" and the like, for the language: such a blunder, however, disfigures the book in more than one place.

Useful Extracts of Everyday French. E. M. Spicer. (Simpkin, Marshall & Co.)

This little book, a collection of cuttings from very recent newspapers, the work of an English teacher of French in a country school, is of good augury. The very modest preface tells how the author, finding, as often happens, that the average English schoolboy took but little interest in the ordinary French Reader, hopes to combine instruction with amusement in the volume under review. There exists already an excellent work of the kind, Jeffcott and Tossell's French Newspaper Reading Book (Hachette), which is well annotated and otherwise very good. Mr. Spicer's book is meant for younger learners, and can claim a place of its own. Like Sam Weller's knowledge of London, its range is "extensive and peculiar," and the young Philistine whose interest is not roused by paragraphs on street accidents, naval manœuvres, bicycle races, school feasts, police cases, elephants' pranks, &c., all told in language as colloquial as possible, may be given up as hopeless. The book, however, must be used with caution, and with due warning that the style is not to be imitated. It would be enough to read it once a week in class. Notes should be added to explain peculiar and unusual words and phrases, many of which are not found in dictionaries.

L'Avare: par Molière. Edited by E. G. W. Brauholtz, M.A., Ph.D. (Cambridge: University Press.)—It will be long before generations of schoolboys and schoolgirls cease to be brought up on L'Avare and Wilhelm Tell; and by this time there is no lack of good editions of these masterpieces. The Pitt Press series, however, in which this edition is included, is of such uniform excellence that one must needs welcome Dr. Brauholtz' volume, which contains a valuable introduction, telling all that the Cambridge Local Examination candidate need know of the history of the play, of its debt to Plautus and Italian comedy, and of the criticism of Rousseau and Schlegel. The grammatical and explanatory notes are adequate and clear.

SCIENCE TEXT-BOOKS.

"THE ELEMENTS OF PHYSICS": Vol. II., Electricity and Magnetism. By E. L. Nichols and W. S. Franklin. (Macmillans.)—This book is intended for the use of students who have acquired some knowledge of mathematics. The information, for the most part, is happily conveyed, and many sections of the work, especially those on electrolysis and the electric field, may be read with pleasure. The illustrations are beyond praise, but their value has been partly destroyed by want of care in lettering. In the notation also capital and small letters are frequently interchanged, and in at least one equation confusion is introduced by using the same letter with two significations. The book contains much that is of value, but it has been rendered less useful to the student by carelessness.

Physiography for Beginners. By A. T. Simmonds. (Macmillans.)—It is anything but a light task to undertake the explanation of the elementary principles of mechanics to persons whose mathematical knowledge is limited to arithmetic, yet Mr. Simmonds has attempted it with great success. The other subjects also are brought well within the grasp of a young pupil. Excellent summaries are given at the end of each chapter, and the book is profusely illustrated. A pupil-teacher who has mastered its contents and has performed the numerous experiments described will never lack material for an object lesson.

Fuel and Refractory Materials. By A. Humboldt Sexton. (Blackie & Son.)—Mr. Sexton has produced a book which will be of great use to students of metallurgy, engineers, and others interested in technical science. The volume does not pretend to treat the subject exhaustively, but to present to the reader its main outlines. This it does with great clearness, an immense amount of information being given in a very readable form; while for those who wish to prosecute their researches further, ample references to larger works and papers on special subjects are appended. The illustrations are well executed, and will give the student a good idea of the actual apparatus and the principles on which it is constructed.

"AN INTRODUCTION TO STRUCTURAL BOTANY": Part II., Flowerless Plants By D. H. Scott, F.R.S. (Adam & Charles Black.)—Elementary botanical text-books, in describing typical plants, often degenerate into a dissertation on so many isolated examples. Dr. Scott has touched upon variations, and at the same time has avoided bewildering the beginner. The chief merit of the book, however, lies in the clear manner in which the life history of each plant is described and its homologies and analogies inferred. The author's method will cause the reader, as he studies each succeeding type, to recall what he has previously learnt. This idea is worth the attention of writers of elementary science manuals. The book contains numerous excellent illustrations.

THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

REPORTS AND RECORDS.

IN response to a request which we submitted to the Head Masters of the principal public schools for reports and records of scholastic events during the past months, we have received the following replies:

BATH COLLEGE.

Term ended with the usual concert and Latin play. This year the play selected was the "Miles Gloriosus." The music—part of which was composed for the occasion, part collected and arranged—was written entirely in the so-called Ionian and Æolian modes. A. E. Coningham as the Miles, G. W. Thomas as Palæstrio, and E. B. Ferrers as Philocomasium, were particularly good. The prologue, in Latin iambs, gave the usual summary of the successes of the year. The first place fell to E. L. D. Cole, O.B., for his Gaisford Greek verse prize—a distinction which thus goes to an Old Bathonian for the second year in succession. Then congratulations to E. L. D. Cole, A. F. Gaskell, and A. J. Morris on their Firsts in classical moderations; to V. M. Ferrers on his major scholarship at Trinity, and on the Abbott Scholarship, Cambridge; to C. W. Dunn on the Stewart of Rannoch Scholarship, Cambridge; to H. W. Garrod on his major exhibition in classics at Balliol; and to C. T. Carr on his classical exhibition at Trinity College, Cambridge. Other successes are—At Oxford: H. H. Herding, classical scholarship, Jesus College; W. H. Goudge, mathematical scholarship, Pembroke; K. T. Frost, classical exhibition, Lincoln; S. E. H. Dowding, mathematical scholarship, Queen's. At Cambridge: J. Scott, classical exhibition, King's; T. C. B. Roscoe, minor scholarship for mathematics, at Clare; H. V. Routh, classical exhibition, Peterhouse, while A. F. G. Moscardi received honorable mention for his place on the I.C.S. list. Work at the new playing field on the hillside opposite the college goes merrily on—our "maior Alcida labos"—as the prologue had it:

"Devexa plaustis alta clivorum iuga, Ut pateat sequor qua prius dorsum fuit."

It is hoped that by the summer it will be ready for match play. The football season was not a success; but though frequently defeated, the team were never disgraced. The cup went to the schoolhouse fifteen, after a splendid struggle in the first heat between Bromleys and Town—Bromleys winning at the second attempt. The first match ended in a draw, six points all. At the Universities, W. H. Goudge, O.B., played in the Freshmen's match (Rugby) at Oxford, and T. B. Boardman in the Freshmen's match (Rugby) at Cambridge, while several O.B.'s got their caps for their various colleges. The Fives Cup was won by the schoolhouse (Thackwell and Johnson). Here, again, Bromleys defeated the Town (2-1) after a close struggle. There has been a great run on the fives courts this term—tournaments and form competitions without end—thanks largely to the energy of our fives captain, N. E. O. Thackwell. The boxing society still flourishes. The lectures for the term were delivered by Mr. Marriott, the subject being "The Age of Elizabeth." At the beginning of term Mr. A. B. James,

B.A., of University College, Durham, joined the staff, vice Mr. Long. Mr. James is a keen sportsman and a good oar. We hope to profit by his coaching on the river next term. Debates and readings, as of old, have occupied our Saturday evenings throughout the term. C. T. Carr is president and H. W. Garrod hon. secretary of the Debating Society. The Junior Debating Society is for the time being quiescent, but will meet again in the Easter term with E. B. Ferrers as president.

BRADFIELD COLLEGE.

There have been some changes on the staff. The Rev. W. A. Hill, M.A., and Mr. W. B. Thomas, B.A., have resigned their posts, while the new appointments are: the Rev. E. Peake, M.A., late Exhibitioner of Oriel College, Oxford, and of Giggleswick School, to the House-mastership of the Junior School; Mr. E. G. Richardson, M.A., late Scholar of Corpus, Cambridge, and of the Royal Naval School, to the mastership of the Navy class; Mr. J. H. Vince, M.A., late Scholar of Christ's College, Cambridge, and of Dover College, to a classical mastership. In consequence of the increase of the age for admission to the Navy, a Navy class has been established. The following scholarships have been gained at the Universities: C. E. K. Church, exhibition, Magdalen, Oxford; D. S. N. Greaves, scholarship, Keble, Oxford; E. G. Lomas, exhibition, St. John's, Oxford; C. E. K. Church (again), exhibition, Merton, Oxford. C. E. M. Blagden has been placed in the second class in the Final Classical School, and has been appointed to a lectureship at Christ Church, Oxford. In connexion with the games, the chief events of note have been the matches against Lancing and Radley, both of which were drawn—the former at four goals, the latter at one goal, each; while the new Pavilion has been completed, at the cost of £950. The total number of members in the Cadet Corps last term was 95. Of these 3 were officers, 31 were enrolled members attached to the A Company of the 1st V. B. Royal Berks Regiment, and 18 were in the band (bugle and drum). Eleven recruits joined the corps. On November 1 a field-day was held on Old Deane Common, at which ninety members attended. N.C.O.'s instruction classes were held weekly through the term.

BRADFORD GRAMMAR SCHOOL.

The following distinctions have been gained at the Universities since September last: E. H. Stapleton, scholarship for natural science, St. John's College, Oxford; G. W. Armitage, scholarship for classics, Magdalen, Oxford; E. E. Walker, exhibition for natural science, Trinity, Cambridge; R. G. Burgess, exhibition for classics, Queen's, Oxford; G. J. Gottschalk, exhibition for natural science, Christ's, Cambridge; J. R. Sedgwick, scholarship for classics, Trinity, Oxford; N. W. Hammond, scholarship for classics, Sidney Sussex, Cambridge; F. G. A. Butler, was placed in the first class in Literæ Humaniores in August, 1896, and passed fifth in the Indian Civil and Home Civil Services; R. E. Coupland, of New College, Oxford, was first in the Indian Police Examination; B. H. Slater, of Trinity College, Cambridge, has been elected to a University scholarship at the Middlesex Hospital; and the Rev. H. de B. Gibbins, M.A. (Oxon.), author of The Industrial History of England, &c., has received the degree of D.Litt. from Dublin University. In the Oxford and Cambridge Board Examinations of July, 1896, 21 higher and 31 lower certificates were gained; the distinctions being 30 and 85 respectively. The school has again won the Yorkshire Public Schools' Challenge Cup, and the first fifteen has an unbeaten record in matches with other schools. The Debating Society has held six fortnightly meetings, and the challenge cup for the best speaker was awarded to K. A. R. Sugden. The Science Club has met fortnightly and discussed papers on carbo-hydrates, crystallisation, the heart, Egypt and Palestine, and celestial photography. The Glee Club has held weekly meetings, and is at present engaged upon Sterndale Bennett's cantata, "The May Queen." On December 14 a gymnastic entertainment was given by a team of boys from twelve to fifteen, in the school gymnasium, under the direction of the instructor, Sergeant-Major Dearing, before a large number of spectators. The Science and Art prizes were distributed on December 17 by the Mayor of Bradford. In the course of the proceedings it was mentioned that the head master (the Rev. W. H. Keeling) that day completed the twenty-fifth year of his connexion with the school.

BRIGHTON COLLEGE.

The third term of 1896 passed very quietly, undisturbed by illness or any great event. For the boys perhaps, the chief interest was the success of the football team, which was unusually strong, defeating Lancing by seven goals to one; perhaps its best performance was the defeat of Reigate Priory. The House Football Cup was won by Chichester House, after a good struggle in the final with Hampden House. The same house also carried off the gymnasium cup. The result of the summer examination showed that five higher certificates and two distinctions from the Oxford and Cambridge Board had been gained, thus fulfilling the hopes for success expressed by Sir John Lubbock at the prize-giving. Among distinctions gained by old boys should be mentioned the elections of Sir E. J. Poynter as P.R.A., and Mr. T. G. Jackson as R.A.; also that in the S.E. district manoeuvres this year Col. W. E. R. Kelly, O.B., commanded the Canterbury force, while Col. E. Clayton, O.B., commanded the opposing force. A memorial tablet in honour of Dr. Griffith, former head master, was unveiled in the college chapel in the summer by the Rev. J. Newton. There was one change on the staff at the conclusion of term, Mr. H. Sharpley leaving the college to take up an appointment at Marlborough; his place as sixth form tutor is to be filled by Mr. H. L. Drake, B.A., of St. John's College, Oxford.

BRECON: CHRIST COLLEGE.

Mr. Rubie has left us, to take up the head mastership of Eltham, Mr. Patterson to join the Mercers' School. They are succeeded by the Rev. C. Foxley, St. John's College, Cambridge, and Mr. P. R. Bartley, Christ's College, Cambridge. C. T. Davis obtained fourth place in the India Civil Service, and (simultaneously) in the Home Civil Service, Class I.; he has gone to the Admiralty. A. J. Harding has been elected to an open exhibition for natural science at St. John's College, Cambridge. Prizes were distributed on September 22 by the Principal of Jesus College, Oxford. We had five higher certificates (two distinctions) and nine lower (twenty-two distinctions). The lectures, inaugurated last year, have been continued; there were three in all. Mr. H. N. Hutchinson gave us an interesting foretaste of his Prehistoric Man, which was going through the press at the time. The Rev. A. C. Fryer (A.C.S.) and the Rev. J. D. James (O.B.) addressed the school on the Lwynypia Mission, to which the boys contribute. The Old Boys had a successful dinner: about seventy assembled. The Bishop of Bangor was present, and the occasion was marked by an announcement that Col. John Morgan was to give extra prizes and exhibitions to the value of £50 in the coming year, with a possibility of the gift becoming annual. "Trial by Jury" was given in the Big School to a large gathering at the end of term, and passed off well. We have to thank Mr. R. D'Oyly Carte for a special permission to perform it. The football fifteen has done fairly, being strong forward, but short of good backs. We lost the Llandovery match easily. T. J. Thomas is playing again for Cambridge. The Cadet Corps was inspected by the General commanding the district, and commended for smartness. There are now fifty-six in the corps. The head master is collecting for a new lectern.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

The number of boys at the school during the autumn term was 148, including three day boys. The latter element will become regular next term, being a new departure only just undertaken. The entrance scholarship results at Cambridge came out very satisfactorily for us. P. B. Haigh was first in classics at St. John's College, and was elected to a foundation scholarship of £70. F. W. Hasluck was third in classics among the candidates in the joint examination of six colleges, and was elected to a foundation scholarship at King's; declining the emolument (£80), he ranks as an honorary scholar, retaining the status and privileges of an ordinary foundation scholar. In addition to these, R. Smailes was awarded an exhibition of £30 at Emmanuel for classics, and R. T. Race one of £40 at St. John's for mathematics. The latter declined his exhibition, as he will be eligible again next year. Last year The Leys had two entrance awards at Cambridge in mathematics, and three in natural science. The mathematical staff has lost Mr. Talbot Peel. An important reconstruction is involved in the appointment of the senior resident master, Mr. J. C. Isard, to the post of bursar. Mr. Isard was senior prefect when the school was founded in 1875, and he has been on the staff since 1880. The football season has been an average one, with seven matches won, seven lost, and one drawn. We defeated Merchant Taylors', Bedford Modern, and Mill Hill Schools, and only lost to St. Paul's by a try. The results would have been better but for the injury of our best scoring three-quarter, W. B. Beckett, in the first match. The House Shield has been won, for the sixth consecutive football season, by North House "B." The second fifteen has won four matches and lost two. On November 5th a public presentation was made by Dr. Moulton to J. Sly, who had been awarded a Royal Humane Society's certificate for saving a man from drowning in Windermere last August. The Orchestral Society gave their annual concert on December 4th, when a successful performance of Handel's Samson was achieved under Dr. Mann's leadership. The principal soloists were from the Guildhall School of Music. Other school societies have been active. The Literary Society has largely added to its numbers, and besides the ordinary meetings for debates, papers, and readings, has had two open lectures, one by Mr. G. E. Green, on "Philip van Artevelde," and one by a visitor, the Rev. W. Pedr Williams, of Clapton, on "Russell Lowell." The Natural History and Science Society has continued its Saturday afternoon lectures in the Kelvin Lecture Theatre, in the Science buildings opened by Lord Kelvin three years ago. Mr. A. H. Evans, of Clare, kindly gave a lecture on "Birds"; and the members of the science staff lectured—Mr. Osborn on "Spectra and Fluorescence," Mr. de Havilland on "Rivers," and Mr. Brownson on "Ventilation." Among the doings of Old Leysians may be mentioned the appointment of W. F. Reddaway, King's, to be lecturer in history to the non-collegiate students, and the following degrees taken at London Universities: T. Penman, B.A. (just after leaving the school), A. H. Spicer, M.B., and F. A. Bainbridge, B.Sc. In another field we note C. F. Hadfield, of Trinity, captaining the C. U. lacrosse twelve, in succession to another O. L. W. W. Gibberd, also of Trinity, has tempered his mathematics with cross-country running; he has been captain of the C. U. harriers, and came in first for them against Oxford. A very prominent question in O. L. circles has been the condition of the O. L. F. C., which a few seasons ago could play the Universities and the best London clubs on equal terms, but which has of late been in grave difficulties, owing to the distance from London of its most effective players. A draw with the London Scottish is the only really good performance this year, and on no occasion could a representative team be collected. An energetic effort has been made to press the financial and other needs of the club on the attention of Old Leysians generally. The annual O. L. dinner has been fixed for Thursday, January 21. The Conversazione, which has hitherto been the event of the Christmas vacation, is this year to be held in May.

KING'S SCHOOL, CANTERBURY.

It is with the greatest regret we have to record the resignation of our head master, the Rev. T. Field, who has been appointed warden of St. Peter's College, Radley. Excepting the time he was at Oxford, when he was a fellow of Magdalen College, and the six years he spent as a master at Harrow, Mr. Field has been closely connected with the school ever since he first came here as a boy thirty years ago. Though his ten years' tenure of the head mastership has been marked by no striking outward changes, Mr. Field may look back with satisfaction at the list of successes gained, and feel that he leaves the school to his successor in a thoroughly efficient state. By his unflinching kindness and keen interest in every department of the school life he has endeared himself to all, and it is with the deepest sorrow that we shall lose him. Valuable presents were given to Mr. and Mrs. Field by the boys, old boys, and masters, and an address by the Dean and Chapter. The Rev. A. J. Galpin has been unanimously elected to succeed him. Mr. Galpin was a Fellow of Trinity College, Oxford, and has been for ten years a master at Marlborough. We look forward with confidence to his coming. There will be no other changes on the staff at present. C. H. Clarke has obtained a classical exhibition at Jesus College, Cambridge. The football fifteen has been only fairly successful, having won four matches and lost seven, though several of the defeats were by very narrow margins. The Harvey (Scientific) Society has taken a new lease of life.

CHELTEMHAM COLLEGE.

The Rev. J. A. Owen, M.A., First Assistant Master of the Classical Department, resigned his post at Christmas to undertake, as unsalaried missionary, the charge of the Cheltenham College Mission at Nunhead, London, S.E. Mr. Owen has been a master at the College for twenty-six years, and achieved notable success with the T.C.S. class. His work with the Upper Sixth (Classical) has likewise been most fruitful. Mr. Owen's departure is universally regretted. It was made the occasion of presentations by his colleagues and by the sixth form, and the ovation which he received from the assembled college at his last appearance will not readily be forgotten by those who were present. His work with the Sixth Form Classical will be undertaken by his son, Mr. A. S. Owen, B.A., of New College, Oxford, as Principal's Assistant. The new chapel, erected at a cost of £13,000, from designs by Messrs. Middleton, Prothero & Philott, of Cheltenham, was opened last term. It is an imposing stone building in the Perpendicular style, with fine groined roof, and is capable of seating 800 persons. The fittings, with the exception of the altar and reading desk, are of a temporary character. The opening ceremony was to have taken place on October 14, when the late Archbishop of Canterbury was to be the preacher. The sudden death of the Archbishop on the 11th rendered a postponement of the festal services necessary, but the chapel was dedicated on the 13th by the Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol. Thanksgiving services for the completion of the structure were held on December 16, the preachers being the Archbishop of Dublin (O.C.) and the Head Master of Rugby School (late Principal). The services were attended by a large company of Old Cheltonians and others interested in the college, who were entertained at luncheon by Lord James, of Hereford (O.C.), President of the College Council. The following scholarships were gained in October, November, and December, 1896:—C. Moore, open classical scholarship, Balliol College, Oxford; F. Luce, open classical demyship, Magdalen College, Oxford; C. G. Grove, open classical scholarship, Hertford College, Oxford; A. S. Lucy, open classical scholarship, Hertford College, Oxford; G. N. Orme, open classical scholarship, Hertford College, Oxford; D. Wenham, open classical scholarship, Pembroke College, Cambridge; A. G. M. Fletcher, open classical exhibition, Trinity College, Oxford; F. C. Watmough, open classical exhibition, Keble College, Oxford; T. H. B. Phillips, open mathematical scholarship, Emmanuel College, Cambridge; C. E. Wright, open mathematical scholarship, Caius College, Cambridge (the above are direct from the school); J. H. K. Adkin, open exhibition in modern history, Keble College, Oxford (left college August, 1896); F. C. Dyer, Organ Scholarship, Corpus Christi College, Cambridge. Entrances to Woolwich (direct from the college), June, 1896:—A. C. Littledale, 5th; R. E. M. Russell, 10th; W. L. Browne, 12th; G. A. P. Brown, 17th; H. A. Ramsay, 25th. December, 1896:—D. A. Thomson, 1st; H. W. Lockhart, 8th; J. P. Benn, 16th; G. W. S. Morris, 19th; A. C. Baylay, 28th. Entrances to Sandhurst (direct from the college), June, 1896:—T. F. Woodham, 16th; C. G. M. Blomfield, 58th; D. J. Dickinson, 60th; T. H. Dansey, 64th; W. S. Poe, 78th. December, 1896 (list not yet issued). Distinctions won by old boys: Rev. C. R. Carter, M.A., Corpus Christi College, Oxford—Fellow of Magdalen College; A. W. Hazel, Hertford College, Oxford—First Class Math. Moderations, December, 1896.

CHRIST'S HOSPITAL.

The Incorporated Association of Head Masters held their annual meeting here on Thursday, the 14th inst., Dr. Wormell being in the chair. Some 200 members of the association were present, and were cordially welcomed by the Head Master. Open scholarships for Classics have been awarded to C. A. Snow and C. W. Welman, at Wadham and Pembroke Colleges, Oxford, respectively.

CITY OF LONDON SCHOOL.

Among recent successes at the Universities we have to record, at Cambridge, the Craven Scholarship, the Prendergast Studentship, and Sir William Browne's Medal for Latin Epigram; at Oxford, the Prize for a Poem on a Sacred Subject, and the Senior Greek Testament Prize.

CLIFTON COLLEGE.

During the last term Mr. Trimnell, who has been Director of Music since the beginning of the school, was succeeded by Mr. A. H. Peppin, and M. Pellissier, who has been appointed to an educational post in France, by Mr. von Glehn. Mr. Pentecost has been appointed a Science Master. The following have gained entrance scholarships at the Universities:—at Oxford: E. Macfadyen, classical scholarship, Wadham College; at Cambridge: E. J. Stanley, mathematical minor scholarship, Trinity College; J. Monteath, classical scholarship, King's College; F. H. Pim, classical scholarship, Christ's College; A. R. Cox, classical exhibition, Emmanuel College; J. Davidson, classical exhibition, Pembroke College; F. A. Haas, science exhibition, Sidney Sussex College. At the recent examination for admission to R.M.A., Woolwich, D. Affleck Graves gained the third place. The following gained admission to R.M.C., Sandhurst:—G. Craster (fifth place), H. R. Watson (tenth place), H. C. McWalters, G. T. Van der Gucht. Among the distinctions gained by Old Cliftonians during the last term are the following:—Admission to the Home and India Civil Service: G. L. Barstow (eighth place), R. J. R. Glancy, A. R. Loftus Tottenham, J. Comes. R. S. Hole has been appointed Fellow of Cooper's Hill; F. W. Hirst to the Russell Research Studentship in Economics; and W. A. Hirst has been appointed Principal of the Government College, Meerut. The following Old Cliftonians serving in the Sudan are mentioned in the Sirdar's despatches:—The late R. Polwhele (a young Engineer of much promise), H. P. Shekleton, J. K. Watson, S. Willcock. Capt. J. K. Watson has been appointed Companion of the Distinguished Service Order, and Capt. H. P. Shekleton has been promoted to be brevet major.

DOVER COLLEGE.

Dr. Astley, chairman of the council, has undertaken to rebuild the class-room wing of the school buildings, so as to add four new class-rooms and improve the existing ones; also to erect at the college gates a porter's lodge, which is to include a "tuck-shop." These buildings are to be put in hand in January, and will be opened in the summer. In connexion with the workshops, there has been a new organisation of classes for junior boys. These are conducted by football sets, when the ground is assigned to other sets, thus furnishing instruction in the rudiments of carpentry as an alternative to games, without taking away from the latter. These classes are very well attended. Additions to the honour list are: W. C. Bowles, classical scholarship, Corpus, Cambridge; S. J. Cox, classical scholarship, St. John's, Cambridge; B. B. Colbeck, Woolwich entrance, twenty-third place. The prizes were distributed in July by Dean Farrar, and the honour list then read by the head master included three scholarships at Cambridge, and successes at Woolwich and Sandhurst. With regard to the last term's games, the Rugby football fifteen had no point scored against them on any ground in Kent.

DURHAM SCHOOL.

Mr. J. T. Johnson, M.A., has been appointed to a science mastership. He has been for nine years the science master at Oakham School, and was formerly a Demy of Magdalen College, Oxford. The head master has returned to resume work, after an enforced absence from ill-health during last term. All Dunelinians have heard with pleasure of the appointment of Dr. Creighton to the Bishopric of London. Dr. Creighton was elected to a King's Scholarship at Durham in 1857, and was one of the most brilliant of Dr. Holden's pupils. J. E. Houldey, the head of the school, has been elected to a scholarship at Clare College, Cambridge. The Old Dunelinian Football Club has been very successful during its first season, and has thoroughly justified its existence. The examination for entrance scholarships will probably be held during the first week in June.

EDINBURGH: FETTES COLLEGE.

Mr. W. G. Coast (Marlborough and King's, Cambridge) has been appointed to the vacancy arising from the resignation of Mr. A. S. Forster. Mr. Forster's retirement was much regretted. The new science buildings will be opened this January. They comprise an enlargement of the old physical laboratory, the addition of a very spacious chemical laboratory, a chemical lecture room, and a general room for lantern work. Hitherto the equipment for science has hardly been sufficient, but the new buildings are a very important addition. During last term J. H. Lumsden was elected to an open classical exhibition at Trinity College, Cambridge, C. O'Flaherty to an open classical scholarship at Christ's College, Cambridge, W. B. Thomson to an open classical exhibition at Wadham College, Oxford, W. R. E. Prentice, W. E. Wait, and R. F. MacFarlan gained bursaries at Edinburgh University, and R. R. Mitchell a bursary at Glasgow University.

EDINBURGH HIGH SCHOOL.

Three new masters have been appointed this session: Messrs. Trotter, Muir, and Ross. Mr. Trotter was High School Club Prizeman in 1885, and Mr. Muir was Macmillan Club Medallist in 1891. Bursaries have been gained at Edinburgh University by J. B. Jameson, A. R. Normand, W. K. Tait, J. S. Ross, and G. Millar; at St. Andrews' University by M. Neill. W. J. Keith has taken the first place in the final examination for the Indian Civil Service; A. B. Keith has gained the Vans Dunlop Scholarship of £300 in classics, at Edinburgh University. At the medical graduation on August 1 last G. R. Wilson, the International football player, was capped M.D., and gained a gold medal for his thesis. Princeton University has conferred the degree of Doctor of Laws on Prof. Seth, of the University of Edinburgh, an old High School boy, and S. H. Capper, dux of the school in 1875, has been appointed Professor of Architecture in the University of Toronto. All High School boys will appreciate the generous offer of Mr. Bruce to place above the west doorway of the hall the carved stone bearing the coat-of-arms of the city, and dated 1578, which has for so long been hidden away in the school museum. The stone (of which an illustration is given in the Schola Regia, the school magazine for December last) was taken from the building in Blackfriars' Wynd, which was erected for the High School in 1578, and used till 1777, when the larger school in Infirmary-street was built. It thus recalls many ancient traditions, and when placed in the present building will form an interesting link binding the school of to-day with the school of olden times.

ELTHAM: THE ROYAL NAVAL SCHOOL.

The Michaelmas term opened with important changes: in the first place it was resolved by the Council to revert to the old name of the school (familiar to "Old Boys" of the R.N.S.) and drop the local name. In the next place, the Rev. R. Percival Brown, after a head mastership of five years, resigned office to take up Dr. Way's work at Warwick. He was succeeded by the Rev. A. E. Rubie, late Senior Hulme Exhibitioner of Brasenose College, Oxford, and for five years head master of Richmond School, Yorks. There were four other changes in the personnel of the staff—viz., Mr. E. L. Richardson (who has gone to Bradfield), Mr. G. R. Joyce (who has a house at Reading School), the Rev. H. R. Humphreys (who follows Mr. Brown to Warwick), and the Rev. A. Cross (bursar). These vacancies were filled by the appointments of Mr. B. W. Pearce, B.A., late exhibitioner of St. John's College, Cambridge (who takes over the mastership of the Navy classes); of Mr. W. L. Bunting, B.A., late Scholar of Trinity Hall, Cambridge, and an old University football "Blue"; and of Mr. T. H. Howson, B.A. (who succeeds the Rev. A. Cross as bursar). Mr. Richardson's house was taken over by Mr. E. W. Rhodes, with Mr. Pearce as his colleague; Mr. Bunting fills the vacancy caused by Mr. Rhodes' housemastership, and Mr. Henwood joined Mr. Minton. One important change in the buildings was effected during the summer holidays. What had been previously the bursar's house was transformed into an additional infirmary, fitted with all the newest appliances of hygienic art; so that with the old sanatorium there is more than ample accommodation for all the ills to which the flesh is heir. There are other contemplated additions in the future. Among the "Honours" gained during the past term we may mention a commission in the Royal Marine Artillery, the notice of which came out on the last prize-day, gained by A. W. G. Ridings (head monitor and captain of cricket), and a sub-sizarship at Trinity College, Cambridge, offered to G. V. Rayment. The result of other "Service" examinations is not yet published. Our own scholarship examination begins on April 1 next. Of the doings of "Old Boys," we may chronicle the following as worthy of notice: a successful annual dinner on Founders' Day, when the chair was taken by J. Clarke, Esq., J.P., the oldest living O. B.; an article in the Fortnightly Review by W. Knox Johnson, Esq., who was proxime

A NEW AND POPULAR

History of England and the British Empire.

From B.C. 55 to A.D. 1890.

By EDGAR SANDERSON, M.A., late Scholar of Clare College, Cambridge.

Giving in narrative form a succinct account of the development of the Empire. The enormous growth of our colonies and other integral parts of the realm beyond the seas have been treated with the exhaustiveness due to the importance of the subject. The work, therefore, presents a most valuable and unique compendium of British History unsurpassed for its comprehensiveness and vivacious treatment. It may at the same time be relied upon to supply all the purposes of the student preparing for examination in the subject.

for a Fellowship at All Souls'; the promotion to a captaincy of F. W. Shea, Indian Staff Corps; the appointment of Colonel J. G. Ponsonby as Military Attaché at Constantinople (on gaining his colonelcy last year, Colonel Ponsonby was the youngest Colonel in the Service); we may also mention a medal of the Royal Humane Society given to G. E. Lucas for saving a "mess-mate's" life at great risk; a commission gained by T. C. S. Bishopp in the Cape Mounted Rifles; and the successful play of F. H. Cavendish in the R. I. E. C. Football fifteen. Other news of O.B.'s is sadder: such as the dedication, by the Bishop of Cork, of a window and tablet in Innishannon parish church to General Sir R. Meade, who had seen much service in India as a soldier, administrator, and diplomatist; the deaths of Mr. A. M. Cleveland, assistant paymaster of H.M.S. Dart; of Rear-Admiral J. W. Webb; of the Rev. J. Gilmore (author of Storm Warriors); and of Major E. W. Hobbs, R.M.A., who passed from us first into Woolwich. To turn to other things: the various school societies have had a flourishing existence during the term, principally we may notice the prosperous state of the carpenter's shop, additions of books to the house libraries, and increased facilities for using the swimming bath. The fund for the building of the chapel increases, but only too slowly; it now amounts to £1,500, when this amount is doubled building will be commenced. The part of the chapel offertory which is devoted to the Home for Waifs and Strays falls this year just short of the £15 required to maintain the boy whom the school supports. We have had several interesting open nights this term, not the least appreciated being a lecture by the Rev. H. H. Hutchinson, F.G.S., on "Extinct Monsters." On September 23 the Queen sent us the following message: "The Queen thanks you all for your kind telegram of loyal congratulations." Turning to athletics, the first football fifteen have had a successful term. Out of ten matches played, six were won and four lost; the team gained 145 points and lost 52. The second fifteen have also played well, and the matches of the Junior House show some promising material for the future. We must not omit to mention that Mr. W. L. Bunting, who has played for Richmond all the season, played in the North v. the South. On December 12 an assault-at-arms was held in the dining-hall. With a view to improving the cricket field for next season, a great part of it has been relaid and freshly levelled. The Elthamian was published as usual at the end of term. The customary "House Supper" concluded the term on December 17.

HARROW SCHOOL.

The loss of one of the school visitors, owing to the death of Archbishop Benson, has been replaced by the translation of the other school visitor, Dr. Temple, to the Archbishopric of Canterbury, Dr. Creighton succeeding him as Bishop of London as the second school visitor, while the vacancy at Peterborough was filled by the choice of an old Harrovian, the Hon. and Rev. E. Carr-Glyn. Another loss to the school by death was that of Mr. W. H. Stone, who had been one of the Governors since 1868, and was senior member but one of that august body. Although Mr. Stone has not been often seen at Harrow recently, he was assiduous in attendance at Governors' meetings, where his financial ability and his aptitude for hard work will be much missed. Mr. W. G. Young, of Eton, and Magdalen College, Oxford, came to Harrow in September as a master in the Army class. The term has been chiefly memorable for the introduction of the electric light into the chapel and most of the school houses. The light has not yet been put into the schoolrooms, but it is understood that it soon will be. Little has been done in the way of building. Ducker Cottage has been rebuilt, and a new wing to the head master's house is nearly complete, but this latter is invisible from the High-street. There is talk of a new block of schoolrooms, but the site and size are not yet fixed. Two benefactions by old Harrovians have been added to our long list. Mr. Yates Thompson has followed up his gift of a drawing school, now in full use, by founding drawing prizes; and the late Mr. E. L. Oxenham left a sum of money by will to be added to the Oxenham Epigram Prizes founded by his father. The subscriptions to the Shaftesbury memorial have taken visible shape in a portrait of the great earl which has been placed in the Vaughan Library. A mural tablet is to be fixed to the old schools to commemorate the place where, as a boy, he made his famous resolve to give his life to helping others. We have had a new edition of the School Song Book, containing a complete set of school songs, and also a number of other well-known songs, not, indeed, special to Harrow, but suitable for house singing. Mr. Cecil Brown, an old Harrovian, is publishing in parts a very remarkable book on "The Horse." The author's illustrations are admirable. Scholarships have been won during the term at Caius College, Cambridge, by C. Hartree, classics; at Clare College, Cambridge, by F. R. Stogdon and A. H. R. Robinson, classics; at Hertford College, Oxford, by J. E. Masterton-Smith, classics; and exhibitions at Trinity College, Cambridge, by G. Savory, science; at Balliol College, Oxford, by E. Wright, history. It is to the credit of the school that, since 1885, sixteen scholarships or exhibitions have been won at Balliol, and that no year has passed without the school being represented in the scholarship list there. In June, H. E. F. Rathbone, 11th; W. G. Belcher, 16th; E. F. St. John, 30th, passed into Woolwich; and J. J. Dalrymple, 7th, Cavalry; C. G. Buchanan, 31st, Infantry; B. P. Lefroy, 39th, Infantry, passed into Sandhurst. In December, H. E. Goad, 8th, and H. W. B. Thorp, 74th, passed into the Infantry; and G. C. Hamilton, 6th, and W. A. Orlebar, 14th, into the Cavalry. This list takes no account of any except those who pass direct from the school. Three old Harrovians, A. E. Batchelor, C. S. F. Crofton, B. N. Bosworth-Smith, passed the I.C.S., L.C.M.S. Amery gained a first in Great. The school football eleven has not had a very successful season, and the difficulty of getting teams to play the school at the Harrow game has been increasingly felt. The adoption of association may thus be brought a step nearer. The Old Harrovian Football Club is also unsatisfactory, and, as far as can be judged, has little wish to mend its ways. In house football Mr. Bushell's was champion house. F. W. A. Rattigan won the Ebrington racket, and Mr. Stogdon's house the championship. The school corps has been temporarily re-animating by an enlistment of more masters and a grant of remission of work to its members; but it remains to be seen whether this policy will be permanently effective.

The Scientific Society has reduced its numbers, and is in consequence much more prosperous than of late. The Debating Society held one meeting, of which complaint was made that most of the house were reading Punch, and then collapsed.

HIGHGATE SCHOOL.

Mr. P. W. Oseroff, of Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge (1st class Natural Science Tripos, 1893), has been appointed to the vacant science mastership, and begins work in January. The governors at their last meeting in December decided to add another wing to the school buildings. P. T. Allen gained an open classical scholarship of £60 a year at Christ's College, Cambridge. The annual school concert took place on December 21, under the conductorship of Mr. F. C. Woods, M.A., Mus.Bac., organist and choir master. Foundation scholarships have been awarded to F. A. Atkey, C. A. Sharpe, A. E. Bishop, and N. Walker; a Gladstone Scholarship to N. A. Robinson; and house entrance exhibitions to J. H. Laurence and J. H. Quigley. Concerning Old Boys we have to record that H. P. Duval (Indian Civil Service), and L. W. C. Schrader (Ceylon Civil Service) left England in November to begin work; R. G. Hetherington (late second lieutenant in the School Cadet Corps) has been appointed captain, and to take command of the Trinity College Company of the 4th (Cambridge University) V.B., Suffolk Regiment; C. C. F. Hosken (late sergeant in the School Cadet Corps) has been appointed sub-inspector in the newly-formed Rhodesia Mounted Police.

LLANDOVERY COLLEGE.

In the Oxford and Cambridge Schools Examination Llandoverly gained this year twenty-eight higher certificates and thirty-eight distinctions, being at the head of the list in distinctions and taking distinctions in all the subjects (ten) offered for the examination. Thus the year 1896 has been a record year for the school in the Oxford and Cambridge Board results, as it was also in scholarships and exhibitions at Oxford and Cambridge. In the year 1897, being the jubilee of the school, an earnest effort is to be made to raise £20,000 to improve and extend the school buildings. The celebration of the jubilee will take place sometime in the summer. A large gathering of Old Boys met at dinner at the Park Hotel, Cardiff, on Friday, January 8, with the view of organising an Old Boys' Jubilee Fund. This year's Rugby football team is specially strong, winning the match against Brecon College, which is the chief match of the season, by three goals and four tries to nil. Three members of last year's team played in the Freshmen's match at Oxford this term. For many years the school choir have, at the end of the Michaelmas term, performed one of Gilbert and Sullivan's operas. The opera selected this year was "Patience," which was a great success.

LEAMINGTON COLLEGE.

Our winter term commenced on September 22, boarders returning as usual on the previous afternoon. Fewer old faces were to be missed than usual, while there was about the average entry of new boys, so that our numbers showed a net increase—this satisfactory result having now taken place for the last nine successive terms. Only one change has taken place in our staff of masters by the appointment of Mr. C. R. H. Castellain, of Trinity College, Cambridge, to an additional mastership.

Our school curriculum has remained much the same as before, the principal alterations that have taken place being in the work of the army class, several additional classes and extra hours of instruction having been arranged for the especial benefit of its members. On the whole, the term has been an uneventful one, save for an epidemic of measles, which more than decimated the various forms. Possibly because they had little time to reflect on such trifles, the boys of the aforesaid army class, with one exception, escaped the scourge. Our annual prize day had to be postponed in consequence of the prevalent illness, but we are looking forward to celebrating it next term. Our various societies have flourished and done good work. The Natural History and Science Society has been especially prominent, quite a large number of members having taken the trouble to prepare some very interesting papers. Several good lectures have been given to the society, perhaps the most popular being an account of the "hot springs" of New Zealand, by the president, and a very attractive paper on the "Nansen Polar Expedition," by Mr. Castellain. The Glee Society held their fortnightly meetings as usual, and enlivened the close of the term by a very bright variety entertainment, which did great credit to their conductor, Mr. Duchesne. The House chess clubs reopened their sittings as the days drew in, and some well-fought tournaments were concluded, some of the games being marked by considerable thought and clever manipulation of the pieces. Considerable improvements have been made in the reading room, owing to the energy of our worthy secretary; the floor having been covered with a warm and restful-looking linoleum, and comfortable chairs having taken the place of the backless forms, while anyone who wants a particular paper can now find it in its proper place.

MALVERN COLLEGE.

The new chapel was begun last term, the architect being Sir Arthur Blomfield, A.R.A. The foundation stone will be placed probably in the summer term. The following scholarships have been gained: R. B. Arnold, classical demyship, Magdalen College, Oxford; H. Westley-White, classical scholarship, Balliol College, Oxford; R. H. Hickman, classical scholarship, Jesus College, Cambridge; A. G. P. Pullan, classical scholarship, Trinity College, Oxford; G. E. de J. du Vallon, classical scholarship, Peterhouse, Cambridge; G. P. Blake, mathematical exhibition, Trinity College, Cambridge; H. E. Piggott, mathematical scholarship, Clare College, Cambridge. A. D. S. Paterson, W. E. Kennedy, J. R. Barrett, and J. M. E. Poole passed into Sandhurst. In the Indian Civil Service examination, E. D. Legh passed 23rd, J. I. G. Hardiman 28th, and G. R. Hignett 46th. C. J. Burnup (capt.), I. Phillips and G. H. Simpson are playing in the Cambridge Association team.

LEEDS GRAMMAR SCHOOL.

Mr. H. T. Kelsey, B.A., late scholar of Trinity College, Cambridge, has joined the staff in the place of Mr. R. Webb, resigned. Among the honours recorded for 1896 are: H. S. Williamson, classical exhibition, Hertford College, and classical scholarship, Christ Church, Oxford; F. W. Allison, classical and mathematical scholarship, Wadham College, Oxford; F. Bradshaw, exhibition for modern history, B.N.C., Oxford; A. E. North, classical exhibition, Worcester College, Oxford. In the Oxford and Cambridge Board examination, six boys gained higher certificates, with four distinctions.

MANCHESTER GRAMMAR SCHOOL.

The school met again on Tuesday, January 19. The amount (£660 13s. 8d.) collected by the boys on behalf of the Playing Fields Fund is on the whole gratifying. The competition for the Proctor Organ Prize took place on Friday, December 4, and comprised the playing of (1) an organ-piece previously selected and announced, (2) a piece chosen by the candidate, (3) a sight-reading test, and (4) a hymn tune. There were three candidates: the winner was Shaw. The following scholarships have been gained: At Oxford: R. R. Scott, Wadham (classics); E. Barton, Corpus (mathematics). At Cambridge: P. F. Lever, Christ's (mathematics); H. Bullough, Sidney Sussex, (science). In June, G. A. Cox took second place in the Indian Police Examination. In football during the latter part of last term three matches were played, of which two were lost, the other won; while in Lacrosse we are able to record a succession of five victories. We sent up eleven freshmen to Oxford in October, three to Cambridge. The chief events for us at the latter university last term was the election of Whittaker to a Fellowship at Trinity. In the Literary Society two papers have been read on William Morris.

MARLBOROUGH COLLEGE.

In games the history of the Christmas Term of 1896 has not been notable for any great success or disaster. The fifteen performed moderately throughout the season. In our two school fixtures we lost to Wellington by a try to nothing, and were unable to play Clifton owing to illness at the latter school. In Cock House match Abbott's (star) beat Galpin's (cross arrows). We fear Mr. Galpin was but half consoled by his unanimous election to the head mastership of King's School, Canterbury. In him we lose with regret a successful and popular house master, who also found time to be a lieutenant in the rifle corps and president of the bicycle club, besides identifying himself with many other school societies. We also lose, but only for a time, Mr. C. A. Alington (O.M.), whose recently won Fellowship at All Souls' obliges him to go into residence at Oxford for a year. In rackets the school pair, after at first promising to win, were beaten by Cheltenham, though only by nine aces in the six games. In the professionals' match which followed, it was some comfort to us to see our professional, Crosby, victorious, after a hard fight, over his Cheltenham rival. In the University Rugby match G. T. Unwin (O.M.) played for Oxford, and W. Mortimer (O.M.) for Cambridge. R. H. Mangles (O.M.) gained his International. N. F. Druce (O.M.) has been elected captain of the Cambridge University Cricket Club. The various school societies have been flourishing. The Rev. A. J. Galpin organised a most successful run of some fifty miles to Cricklade for the benefit of the bicycle club. The natural history society enjoyed, besides their field day at Cirencester, two most interesting lectures by Mr. R. S. Middleton, F.S.A., and Mr. F. Enoch, F.E.S., on "Egyptian Architecture" and "Insect Life" respectively. The school had the pleasure of listening to lectures by Mr. Lynd on "Musical Instruments," and by Mr. E. J. Wood on "Canada." The rifle corps were prevented by bad weather from going to Cheltenham for their field day, a somewhat lucky accident, for they were thus able, later in the term, to enjoy the Public Schools' field day at Camberley. They are just now rejoicing in the arrival of the new rifle. A class for physical drill has been started, which has proved very popular with the school in general. The Rev. E. Noel-Smith (O.M.), our missionary at Tottenham, came down to make his report to us, and preached in chapel the following Sunday (October 11). Canon Gore preached in the chapel on November 7. Among other school honours won this term may be mentioned: C. A. Alington, a Fellowship at All Souls' College, Oxford; J. W. Crowfoot, a studentship at the British School at Athens; R. J. Horton-Smith, university scholarship, St. Thomas' Hospital; R. H. Griffin, classical scholarship, Corpus College, Oxford; A. W. F. Blunt, classical exhibition, Corpus College, Oxford; C. S. Risley, classical demyship, Magdalen College, Oxford; C. Boutflower, mathematical minor scholarship, Trinity College, Cambridge; G. B. M. Hare, classical exhibition, Hertford College, Oxford; G. F. Blackburne-Daniell, classical scholarship, Pembroke College, Cambridge; S. M. Grier, classical scholarship, Pembroke College, Cambridge; J. F. Gaskell, mathematical scholarship, Gonville and Caius College, Cambridge; C. Woodward, classical exhibition, Worcester College, Oxford. We notice with regret the deaths of several distinguished Old Marlburians, and especially that of William Morris.

MAGDALEN COLLEGE SCHOOL, OXFORD.

Our new buildings are now full. An Old Boy, Mr. J. A. J. Drewitt, of Magdalen College, has been elected to a Fellowship of the same Society. On our staff, Mr. E. C. Sherwood, of Magdalen, has joined us as mathematical master; Mr. P. S. Allen, of Christ Church College, is leaving us for a Government appointment at Lahore University; and Mr. P. D. Pullan, of Christ Church, is filling the vacancy so caused.

RADLEY COLLEGE.

The chief event in the history of the school during the last term has been the resignation of the warden, the Rev. Henry L. Thompson, on his appointment to the vicarage of St. Mary the Virgin, Oxford. Mr. Thompson had been warden since January, 1889, and during his office the freehold of the college had been purchased and about £30,000 spent in the erection of new buildings, including class-rooms, dormitories, infirmary, cloisters, and chapel. A new boarding-house, capable of holding thirty-eight boys, is in course of erection, and will be opened at Easter next. Mr. Thompson's successor is the Rev. Thomas Field, head master of King's School, Canterbury. During the year 1896 two classical scholarships (at Christ Church and Worcester Colleges, Oxford) have been gained; one admission to Woolwich, and one to Sandhurst.

READING SCHOOL.

The past year, and the term which has just elapsed especially, have been remarkable for the rapid growth of the school. Three new boarding-houses, with accommodation for a hundred boys, have been opened. The staff has been increased by the appointments of Messrs. A. W. Gundry, M.A., late scholar of Emmanuel College, Cambridge; R. F. L. Holme, M.A., late scholar of Queen's College, Oxford; G. R. Joyce, B.A., St. John's College, Cambridge; J. C. B. Tirbutt, Mus. Bac., music master; and A. B. Porter, assistant art master; while Messrs. H. V. Plum, M.A., and R. Paynder, assistant art master, have accepted appointments elsewhere. The past term has witnessed the erection of the new physical laboratory and a carpenter's shop. The physical laboratory consists of a lecture theatre, with seating accommodation for about ninety boys, and of the laboratory proper. The chemical laboratory has been fitted up during the past year with a quantity of fresh apparatus. Last term has also witnessed the foundation of a museum, which ought in the future to prove of great use to the school. A movement to supply the school chapel with a new organ was also successfully started. Among the distinctions won by the school were: H. S. Davis, classical scholarship at Corpus Christi College, Oxford; F. E. Lucey, mathematical exhibition at Worcester College, Oxford; F. G. Clarke, classical exhibition at Kettle College, Oxford; A. M. Pountney, Easter cadetship (Indian Civil Service). October 18 falling on a Sunday, the Vice-Chancellor of the University of Oxford appointed the 21st for the visitation day. The luncheon in the gymnasium was followed by the Speeches in the Big School, which was hardly large enough to accommodate the visitors, who numbered considerably over a thousand. The Vice-Chancellor distributed the prizes and delivered a short address to the boys. As usual, the cricket and football matches have been numerous, and although very successful in both departments, the school has achieved a larger number of victories in the latter. During the term just concluded the school won ten and lost four matches, scoring sixty-three goals to thirty-five, most of the teams played being Oxford colleges; the rest, other school teams. J. Wells, M.A., Fellow of Wadham College, Oxford, formerly captain of the school, has published "A Short History of Rome" for school use; and C. M. Jessop, M.A., Fellow of Clare College, Cambridge, late a mathematical master in the school, married on December 16 last the eldest daughter of Prof. Lebour.

ROSSALL SCHOOL.

The following honours have been gained at the Universities: P. G. Campbell, exhibition, Balliol College, Oxford; C. L. Stocks, scholarship, Wadham College, Oxford; J. Chadwick, scholarship, and W. K. Armitstead, exhibition, Pembroke College, Cambridge; C. B. Tayler, scholarship, and B. W. N. Russell, exhibition, Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge. The annual football match with Stonyhurst College was played on December 3, and after a brilliant game resulted in a victory for ourselves by six goals to three. The match with the Old Rossallians was played on December 21. The Old Rossallians, who were very strongly represented, won by five goals to three. The same evening the annual singing competitions were held. The House Cup went to Christie's, the chief solo prizes to F. L. Williamson and F. W. Loveday. The Christmas holidays began December 22, and ended January 20. Fourteen entrance scholarships at the school are offered for competition in the coming term, the examination for which will begin on March 30, 1897.

RUGBY SCHOOL.

Only honours and scholarships gained in the early part of last year are included in the following list:

Five classical scholarships have been gained at Oxford: by H. E. Butler (New), R. T. Bridge (Oriel), A. T. Scott (Oriel), D. A. Bannatyne, (Exeter), H. G. Robertson (University). At Cambridge, J. S. Coates has been elected to a natural science scholarship at Trinity, and D. F. Bishop to a mathematical one at Emmanuel. There have been three admissions to Woolwich: H. L. Mackworth (7th), J. W. Scott (36th), H. Farrant (39th); and two to Sandhurst: W. Pepys (2nd Cav.), and J. A. Greer (116th). Honours scored by old Rugbeians have been—at Oxford: three first classes in classical moderations (R. R. Bannatyne, A. L. Danson, H. R. Ward); at Cambridge, first classes in the Mathematical Tripos, Part I., in the Natural Science Tripos, Part I., and in the Law Tripos, Part II., by J. F. Marshall, D. P. Watson, and F. N. Creswick respectively; while J. H. Tupper and H. D. D. Rendall have passed into the I.C.S., and F. J. Marshall and H. W. Mann have obtained commissions from Sandhurst with honours. The Rifle Corps is flourishing: A company contains 98 members on the roll, and B. company 79. The work spent on the new museum has cost us £270. The erection of the new building was largely due to the late head master, but it has found a good friend in his successor.

The counting of the rooks' nests in the Close has come to an end. The disastrous storm of March 24, 1895, is responsible for the sudden termination of the annual lists which have been carried on continuously since 1873. Twenty of the oldest elms were blown down, and even from those which remained many nests were torn out by the fury of the gale and scattered on the ground. Perhaps, in time, the birds will return to their old home; but, in any case, the interest is destroyed of a record of rooks which built, year after year, in the same spot, and were carefully protected from molestation in any form. When the counting was first begun there were eighty-nine elms in the Close. The average number of nests, during the twenty-two years from 1873 to 1894 inclusive, was 93 per annum, with a minimum number of seventy-six in 1881 and a maximum of 110 in 1892. The storm of March, 1895, was most fatal, for twenty trees were then destroyed; most were blown completely out of the ground, the rest were in such a dangerous condition that they had to be felled by the foresters. Thus, of the eighty-nine elms existing in 1876, only forty-three now remain. The "Three Trees" have entirely disappeared; while only three remain—and all of these sadly mutilated—out of the twenty, which formed a continuous line from the Island to the end of the school house wall, and were one of the chief ornaments of the Close and the school.

SEDBERGH SCHOOL.

The new chapel, which is being built through the generosity of the masters, Old Boys, and other friends of the school, is now being roofed over, and ought to be ready for use by July. Interesting lectures have been given during the October term by Mr. Lynd on the "X Rays," and by Mr. A. Diósy on the War between China and Japan. A. H. Scott has been elected to an exhibition at Wadham College, Oxford, and H. G. Gandy has passed twelfth into Woolwich.

ST. PAUL'S SCHOOL.

At St. Paul's the past term has been one of unusual progress in the material equipment and decoration of the school. In the first place, Mr. Hamo Thornycroft is engaged on a commission to execute a bronze statue of Dean Colet at a cost of £4,000, the generous gift of E. Howley Palmer, Esq.; secondly, a "Jowett Memorial" organ has been erected by subscription in the Large Hall at an expenditure of about £1,100; thirdly, Mr. Spence has been commissioned to commence covering the south end of the hall with mosaics, similar to those in St. Paul's Cathedral, representing "Christ Jesus in puericiâ" (to Whom the school is dedicated), St. Paul, and Dean Colet—the total cost of which will exceed £1,200, and will be defrayed partly out of the Colet Memorial Fund and partly by additional donations; and, fourthly, the Governors have determined to build a swimming bath. In the Oxford scholarship examinations St. Paul's has obtained, inter alia, two classical demys at Magdalen and two classical scholarships at Trinity, while the "Old Paulines" have performed a really brilliant feat in the examination for the Ireland and Craven scholarships by securing five places out of ten on the list—viz., the Ireland Scholarship, one Craven scholarship, one Proxime Accessit, and two honourable mentions. The Radcliffe Travelling Fellowship has been awarded to Mr. T. H. Butler, and at Cambridge Mr. J. Lupton has been elected Fellow of St. John's. During the term the school has been divided into five sections for the purposes of games. Each section has one half-holiday a week, and the games are compulsory, except for those who are medically excused. This is believed to be a new departure in schools where, as at St. Paul's, boarders are in a considerable minority, but the experiment has amply justified itself, and the beneficial effects should extend far beyond the limits of the school cricket and football. The judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the appeals of the Trustees and the Governors of St. Paul's against the proposed new scheme of the Charity Commissioners has been again postponed. It will be remembered that the Charity Commissioners wished to divert from St. Paul's a considerable proportion of its endowments, and at the same time sought, in a somewhat technical manner, to declare that the school, having been founded before the Reformation, is not entitled to be considered a Church of England school under the Endowed Schools Act. The latter point is at issue in the appeal; the question of endowment will arise when the scheme is laid on the table of the two Houses of Parliament. Whatever may be the result of the litigation, there is a strong feeling that parliamentary powers should be obtained to put the school on the same legal footing as other public schools. St. Paul's was included in the Public Schools Commission and in the original Public Schools Bill, and is still included in the Public Schools "Suspensory" Act (in so far as under the Statute Law Revision Acts that measure remains in force). It was only omitted from the subsequent Public Schools Act at the request of the trustees themselves, who urged before the Lords' Committee that its inclusion at that particular moment might prejudice a then pending law-suit, which, however, has now been long settled. C. G. Botting, Esq., B.A., has been appointed to an Assistant Classical Mastership, vice F. Carter, Esq., M.A., resigned on election to the Greek Professorship in McGill University, Canada.

SUTTON VALENCE SCHOOL.

Mr. J. E. Jones, B.A., of Jesus College, Oxford, has resigned his post, and is succeeded by Mr. R. E. Lewis, B.A., of Selwyn College, Cambridge, till now a master in the Subordinate School at Rugby. There are four distinctions at the University to record: H. G. Smith, scholarship, Queens', Cambridge; C. G. Davison, sizarship, Sidney Sussex, Cambridge; F. J. H. Darton, scholarship, St. John's, Oxford; A. G. Oyler, exhibition, St. Catherine's, Cambridge. A new laboratory, with a lecture room adjoining, is to be commenced forthwith. Among old boys, C. G. Davison won the quarter-mile at the Cambridge University Freshmen's sports, and W. G. Collett, M.A., has been appointed to a mastership at Wellington College.

TONBRIDGE SCHOOL.

The number of boys now in the school is 445; the increase, which began six years ago, has been steadily maintained. The vacancy on the staff, caused by the retirement of Mr. E. H. Goggs, after over thirty years' service, has been filled by the appointment of Mr. G. R. R. Routh. A racquet court is being built as a memorial to the late T. W. Dale, an old Tonbridge boy who was distinguished in many branches of sport, and gained the rare distinction of a double blue, having been in the Cambridge Eight and Eleven. An effort is being made to raise funds to build a school chapel. Owing to the great increase in numbers, the school has outgrown its present chapel, and the governors are unable to provide a suitable building, in consequence of the action of the Charity Commissioners. The foundation is wealthy, but its funds have been drained by the large block of new buildings lately erected, so that without the sanction of the Charity Commissioners it is not possible for the governing body to provide a sufficient sum for the chapel. Following the example of Marlborough, Cheltenham, and Haileybury, the authorities have determined to raise a fund by appealing to old Tonbridge boys and others interested in the school. The school has been fairly successful in football during the past term, having played drawn games with Dulwich College and Sherborne School, though it was by nine points to eight by St. Paul's.

UPPINGHAM SCHOOL.

Considerable additions are being made in completing the School House Court by the addition of a block of buildings fronting High-street, at a cost of £10,000, containing a chemical laboratory, a lecture-room, a museum, a tower and porter's lodge, to which will adjoin a group of class-rooms. At the same time, new engineering and carpentry Workshops are being built on Scale Hill, and a new Isolation Ward in Fairfield, which the Trustees have recently acquired from the executors of the late head master, Mr. Thring. The buildings will be opened in the summer. A statue of the Queen has been offered by Mr. W. F. Rawnsley, as a present to his old school in the sixtieth year of the Victorian reign by one who is teaching two of her Majesty's grandsons. Two new masters join the school this month one of whom is not unknown to it. Mr. W. C. Perry, M.A., Exeter College, Oxford, formerly the house master of Fircroft, then a schoolmaster at West Malvern, and now again returning after seven years to his old school; and Mr. Horace Puckle, M.A., Hertford College, Oxford, in succession to the late Mr. Bernard Belcher, whose place has been supplied for six months by Mr. A. Faessler. The lamented death of H. H. Stephenson, which occurred on the first day of the Christmas holidays, has removed a well-known figure, who for twenty-five years nobly and loyally upheld the best interests of sport at Uppingham, and gave himself heart and soul to the moral good of the boys. He was introduced to Uppingham by that first-rate cricketer, Mr. C. E. Green (O.U.), who thereby conferred a deep and lasting benefit on the school. At the Old Uppinghamian biennial dinner in London on the 14th inst., Mr. R. L. Harrison, as the first captain of the Elevens trained by "H. H.," announced the formation of a committee, including Mr. Green, Mr. G. Borthwick, president of the Uppingham Rovers, and perhaps 100 more names, to consider a memorial of him. His name will be also associated with the extension of the Middle Ground, which object he had much at heart, and which was completed within a few days of his death, at a cost of £500. The addition of new levelled grass enlarges that ground to some eleven acres. The amusements of next term will be either tobogganing or football, according to weather, followed by hockey, followed by the sports; but for once the term will consist of only eleven weeks instead of twelve, and the Easter holidays will be lengthened at the expense of the summer. Since the opening of Mr. Gale Thring's new house, Farley, in September last, it has required enlargement, so that the total of 400 boys, which has never before been attained, is just accommodated. The second Cropper Scholarship, for work not taught in the school course, will be awarded in July next, for the best collection and exposition of the flora of Uppingham and the neighbourhood. There are now in the school three open entrance scholars—W. Newbold, demy of Magdalen College, Oxford; A. K. Smith, scholar of Pembroke College, Cambridge; and R. Linton, scholar of Clare College, Cambridge.

WELLINGTON COLLEGE.

At the funeral, in Canterbury Cathedral on October 16, of Archbishop Benson, the first head master of the college, besides many connected with Wellington, both Old Masters and Old Boys, there was present a special deputation of seven representatives of the Old Wellingtonian Society. These were J. Y. Hay, H. Steele, W. R. G. Hay, H. A. Haines, S. Ball, and the Revs. J. G. Curry and E. C. Bowring, who were at the college between 1863 and 1877. Among the pall-bearers were the Dean of Lincoln, late master, and the present master of the college. The Rev. C. R. Carter, who has been on the staff of the college since he left Oxford, has been elected to an official Fellowship at Corpus, on his appointment as Dean of Divinity. Lectures have been given during the past term on the piano-forte, on Canada, on Benvenuto Cellini, and on colour. H. B. Barkworth has been elected to an exhibition at Pembroke College, Cambridge; and for service in the Soudan Campaign, Lieut. G. F. Gorringer has been awarded the D.S.O. The college was represented by a company, mustering sixty of all ranks, at the Public Schools Field Day on Old Deane Common on October 28. Owing to the whole holiday our detachment was somewhat smaller than usual. This year's Rugby match against Marlborough was the tenth of the series, the match having been first played in 1887. Of these we have won six, lost three, and one was left drawn. This year the game was played at Marlborough, in torrents of rain and a high wind. Water was standing in pools in many parts of the ground. The result was a win for us by one try to nil. The match against University College, Oxford, which was played at Wellington on December 5, was won for the school by a goal and a try to a try. The visitors brought five O.W.s. in their team.

WESTMINSTER SCHOOL.

The play this year was the Phormio, which was last acted in 1891, the death of the Duke of Clarence having caused an intermission of the cycle in 1892. The play was acted on December 17, 21, and 23. The theme of the prologue was "Vivat Regina!" It referred to the part played by the school at the Coronation, when that cry was raised by the boys from their place in the Abbey. In the sixtieth year of the Queen's reign the oldest peer, the Earl of Mansfield, and the oldest judge, Lord Esher, are Westminsters. Allusion was also made to the rebuilding of Rigaud's and to Sir E. J. Poynter. The epilogue was a miscellany, and the incidents succeeded each other with little connexion. It showed much fondness for the bilingual pun, and in some ways compared unfavourably with its immediate predecessors. It was, however, very well acted. The Mure Scholarship is awarded to H. L. Henderson, the Gumbleton Prize to E. F. Colville, the Ireland Prize to M. L. Gwyer, and the Phillimore Prize to P. T. Jones. The Debating Society has discussed, among other subjects, the Armenian question and the isolation of England. The football eleven had but three old choices, and was at first very unsuccessful. It has since improved, and hopes to be yet better next term. The re-building of Rigaud's has proceeded without interruption. The excavations did not yield much of interest. A few coins were found near the surface, and lower down in the peat there were discovered a bowl of copper and the jaw of a wild boar. These will be placed in the school museum. The architect of the new building is Mr. T. G. Jackson, R.A., architect to the Governing Body. Of Old Westminsters, Sir E. J. Poynter has been elected President of the Royal Academy, Sir F. J. Maclean has gone to India as Chief Justice of the High Court of Bengal, and G. B. Piggott to Nyassaland as Chief Judicial Officer. E. H. Marsh, scholar of Trinity College, Cambridge, and late Chancellor's Medallist, passed second on the list into the Civil Service, and is now in the Colonial Office. J. S. Phillimore, student of Christ Church, Oxford, has gone into residence as tutor in classics. Nine Freshmen have gone into residence at Oxford, and eleven at Cambridge. The term's obituary includes the Rev. Carr J. Glyn, the oldest incumbent in the Church; the Rev. Sir John H. Fludyer, Bart., the oldest incumbent in the diocese of Peterborough; the Earl of Normanton; Rear-Admiral Walter Stewart, C.B.; Mr. L. C. Jennyson-D'Eyncourt, and others.

PENS AND PENCILS.

A pocket pen—namely, a pen containing nib and automatic ink supply, is a convenience ; but only if one can be quite sure that it will not, on occasion, fill the pocket with ink through the feed-hole. A fountain pen saves the trouble of dipping, enables the user to have his own pen always at hand without the necessity of having recourse to his desk, and saves persons who have to write away from home the disagreeableness of using strange nibs. The objections to a pocket fountain pen are the tendency already mentioned to spill the ink, and the necessity of shaking the ink down on to the nib before the pen can be used.

THE CAW FOUNTAIN PEN dispenses with both these objections. It cannot be put away without being hermetically closed ; it can be carried in any position, and subjected to any amount of shaking, and not one drop of ink can, by any possibility, get out of it. The nib—which is a gold one of fine quality, and can be selected to suit any hand—is carried actually in the ink, and the pen is thus ready for use the moment it touches the paper. The price is 12s. 6d.

From the foregoing remarks it will be seen that the CAW FOUNTAIN PEN has all the advantages of a stylographic pen, with the additional one of having a nib instead of a style point, so that one writes one's own hand with it ; but for people who still prefer a stylograph, the same Company makes the CAW STYLOGRAPHIC PEN. It is better than any other style of stylographic pen ever made, and is in fact, a perfect ink pencil. The price is 5s.

And now about Pencils. About half the lead of an ordinary lead pencil is wasted in cutting the cedar, about two-thirds of the lead of an ordinary coloured pencil is wasted in the same way, and by breaking while in use. In either case, the point of a pencil, whether black or coloured, is troublesome to make, and, except in the hands of a few skilful persons, irregular and unsightly. THE BLAISDELL SELF-SHARPENING PENCIL is not made of wood at all ; it is just like an ordinary pencil, but the lead is covered with paper, and by an ingenious device it can be resharpened by simply pulling off a little of the paper. The sharpening is absolutely automatic ; you cannot take off too much or too little of the cover ; it is always just right. The point is easily made perfectly symmetrical, and beautifully tapered. There is no possibility of the lead being broken in sharpening, because the lead has only to be lightly touched. The lead is round instead of being square, as in many lead pencils, so that there are no awkward corners to disfigure the writing.

Nobody who has to use a blue pencil, or any coloured pencil, would ever be content with an ordinary one after using a BLAISDELL pencil ; and the BLAISDELL black lead pencil is also better than any ordinary black lead pencil ever made. Samples of each kind of pencils will be sent post free, on receipt of 1s., to any address in the United Kingdom by the BLAISDELL PAPER PENCIL CO., 46, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C. British Depot for the CAW pens.

THE NEW (TENTH) VOLUME OF BOOK PRICES CURRENT.

Being a Record of the Prices at which Books have been sold at Auction, with the Titles and Descriptions in Full, the Catalogue Numbers, and the Names of the Purchasers from December, 1895, to November, 1896.

The new volume contains, for the first time in the history of BOOK PRICES CURRENT, a Subject Index of an extensive character, and a large number of entries, which seemed to stand in need of elucidation or explanation, have been carefully annotated, either Bibliographically or Historically, and collations of many of the books have also been given.

"The record is extremely useful for buyers and collectors of books, and is a valuable index to current phases of book-collecting and to fluctuations in the market."—Saturday Review.

"Valuable to booksellers and still more so to book-buyers."—Athenæum.

"It will furnish a record of great use and interest to the bibliophile."—Notes and Queries.

"It will enable owners to know the market value of their possessions, which is often, in these days of the first edition craze, a great deal higher than the uninitiated would imagine."—Pall Mall Gazette.

ACADEMY PORTRAITS.

XI.—LORD MACAULAY.

THOMAS BABINGTON MACAULAY was the son of Zachary Macaulay, an ardent abolitionist, the friend of the famous group which gathered round Wilberforce and Clarkson. Somewhat Evangelical, therefore, were the early surroundings of the famous essayist, destined to be one of the most broad-minded of men, the author of that essay on the wisdom and grandeur of the Roman Church which would have sent horror to the roots of his family's hair. Early distinguished by omnivorous reading and the old-fashioned literariness of his speech, his first attempts in letters were a couple of fragments which aimed at reproducing the life of dashing young Greek and Roman patricians, having for their heroes such typical "mashers" of the antique world as Alcibiades and Cæsar. It was a characteristic beginning in one whose mental bent was throughout towards resurrecting the life of past ages. Then came that connexion with the Edinburgh Review which produced the most valuable work of his life; and made, while it lasted, the glory of the Edinburgh. He entered Parliament as member for Edinburgh, which he represented for many years; being thrown out on one occasion, and restored on the next opportunity by the repentant city at its own cost. A successful parliamentary career was interrupted for a time by his experience as an Indian official, which provided the materials for his essays on Clive and Warren Hastings. From the outset of his career he was a member of the brilliant Holland House circle. He lived to publish a History of England, which was regarded, in its day, as ranking with the work of Hume and Gibbon; and died in the full enjoyment of a reputation as the most brilliant prose writer and talker of his time. It is doubtful whether it should be regarded as an addition to or detraction from his good fortune that he remained to the last a bachelor.

It was a varied career; yet brilliantly unromantic, splendidly commonplace, "out of obvious ways ne'er wandering far." In this, his life—like all men's lives—was typical of the man, and the genius of the man, which lay essentially in making strikingly obvious the obviously striking. The recluse De Quincey, with an infinitely more circumscribed career, wove into it infinitely more arresting romance. Coleridge, leading the petty life of a hack-writer, "bound in shallows and in miseries," yet imposed on that life the poetry of his own character. Keats shed the halo of the younger gods around an existence of small parlours, suburban gardens, and Hampstead Heath. But Macaulay in the purple would have been a crowned bourgeois; a-top of Olympus he would have wielded middle-class majesties, and ordered his thunderbolts from Whitworth's; while he would have lightened on the Olympian thrones and principalities in quarterly proclamations, flashing with antitheses, sounding the blessedness of modern Olympian "progress," and pointing out how much things had improved since the days when the gods were unbreeched savages, content with a monotonous diet of ambrosia, and drinking doubtful nectar in place of Madeira. "We are better clothed, better fed, better civilized;"—so would have run the proclamation of Zeus-Macaulay. "We no longer quarrel like children, drink like tavern-companions, and cut antiquated witticisms at the delicate jest of a limping cup-bearer black from the forge. The thunderbolts of Whitworth are of more skilled manufacture than the thunderbolts of Hephæstus. Poseidon still rules the waves, but he rules them with a better-made trident. He has his carriage from Bond-street, his horses would not disgrace the Row; he is a well-dressed gentleman, instead of a naked barbarian. Aphrodite has not lost the primacy of beauty, because her fashions are more those of Paris, and less those of Central Africa. The good old times were the bad old times: the very kitchens of Olympus bear witness that there has been such a thing as progress, the very toilet-table of Hera testifies to the march of enlightenment." As his mind, so was Macaulay's life. He was content to take the goods the gods had provided him; satisfied with himself, his position, and his day. The day returned the compliment, as it always does, by being satisfied with him. "Thou art a blessed fellow," it said with Prince Hal, "to think as every man thinks; never a man's thought in the nation keeps the roadway better than thine." He was made for great success rather than great achievement. In all he did he was popular—honourably and deservedly popular; in all he did he was content to pluck something short of the topmost laurels. He was a successful politician, yet never reached the positions attained by men far more stupid; his speeches, immeasurably superior to the parliamentary eloquence of the present day, filled the House, yet he has left no great name as an orator; he was a great talker in an age of great talkers, yet the tradition of his talk has not impressed itself on literary history as did the traditional talk of Coleridge, Lamb, De Quincey, or Sydney Smith. He wrote history brilliantly, and no serious historian accepts his history as serious history. He wrote essays which profoundly influenced literary style—yea, even to the style of the newspaper-leader; yet it is not altogether certain whether they will maintain their place among the classical classics of English prose. His genius was so like prodigious talent that it is possible to doubt whether it was not prodigious talent very like genius. He was "cock-sure of everything," in Melbourne's famous epigram, but posterity is by no means cock-sure of him.

The most permanent part of his literary baggage is undoubtedly the Essays. It is easy to say what they are not, which Mr. George Meredith has declared to be the national mode of criticism; a mode of criticism not without its uses when the universality of a man's fame has made fault-finding an unpopular task, but decidedly the cheapest and lowest part of a critic's duty. What they are not is largely responsible for the reaction against Macaulay. Our day has seen the rise and strengthening of a very subtle school of style, marked by delicate verbal instinct, and extreme attention to the melody of syllables and sentences. It is the day of Stevenson and Mrs. Meynell; a day which is like to underrate Macaulay: for Macaulay is not subtle, is not careful of verbal choiceness. It is a delicate day, in which "mere rhetoric" is rather frowned upon; and Macaulay is brusque, off-hand, revelling in all devices labelled rhetorical: in balance, antithesis, epigram of the cut-and-thrust order. It is fearful of the obvious; Macaulay loves the obvious with impatient middle-class thoroughness. To take the surface-view, and exaggerate its glaring obviousness until to refuse the accepting of it is almost as difficult as to shut out a lightning flash—that is meat and drink to him. On the other hand, he has qualities as well as defect of qualities; and the critic should cultivate the habit of regarding a man chiefly for what he is. The man who is always croaking of his friends' shortcomings is not more hateful than the critic to whom a literary sun is spots set off by interspaces of light: for to every true critic the masters of literature should be friends. If he love literature, he should love the makers of literature. The creative artist may be forgiven, or, at least, palliated, if to him literature is largely a vehicle for the display of his own personality; but the critic is unendurable to whom the monuments of literature are what other monuments are to the British tourist—an opportunity for carving his own name on them.

And Macaulay's qualities are such as we should be specially thankful for in our day. If it is a delicate day, it is also a day given to languor; and Macaulay is always vital with energy—or, as the man in the street would say, "all there." It is a day in which there is a penn'orth of refined style to an intolerable deal of uttermost slovenliness; and Macaulay has always a conscience of style. It is a day which shirks the labour of producing unified wholes, which dribbles away in snatches, mumbles and slathers the literary bone in its lazy jaws. Macaulay displays symmetry, proportion, unity, a sense of the balance of parts, in all his essays. Perhaps none of the principal masters of the essay are so exemplarily artistic in this point. De Quincey is apt to be fragmentary, at the best seldom maps out and proportions his work: he overflows on some points, draws in tantalisingly on others, and leaves the reader with a mingled impression of extreme thoroughness and scamped work. Landor is wandering and capricious. Hazlitt is a shower of sparks. Addison is by profession a pleasant meanderer; Stevenson's very method is whim. One might prolong the list. But Macaulay's essay is always built up soundly in the stocks. Deep it does not go, but proportion it always keeps; the thing is undeniably a miniature whole. Then, if the stimulant devices are too restlessly stimulant; if they are sometimes cheap; if balance, antithesis, point, artful abruptness, are carried to an extent which gives a savour of the accomplished literary showman calling attention to his wares: yet they are undeniably effective, touched in with a deft and rapid hand; the reader is lifted along unflaggingly. And it is literature; if he have nothing new to say, old things are newly said, with surpassing cunning in the presentment. The flow of instances with which an extraordinary memory enables him to support his points may be excessive at times, may be inexact at times (as the argument by parallel and analogy rarely fails to be, except in the most scrupulous hands), but it lends surprising life and picturesqueness to what with most men would have been dry discussion. For his much-vaunted lucidity we have less praise. He is lucid by being inexact, superficial, taking the obvious road in everything which is the easy road; and his arrangement is often the reverse of clear from the logical standpoint. But if he is no starter of original views, if he keeps to the surface of things, he must not be denied the merit of presenting that surface with a painter-like animation. Here is his power; it is on this that his fame must rest, if it is to be permanent. As a critic he is nought; as a biographer or historian he is nought so far as exactitude of treatment, novelty, or philosophy of view is concerned. But he can revivify a period, a person, or a society, with such brilliancy and conciseness as no other Englishman has done. It is not a new thing to say; but Macaulay, being the apotheosis of the obvious, is too easy food for critics that any one should utter novelty of him at this date.

In one respect alone have we any disposition to quarrel with the routine view of him. We are disposed to put in a good word for his ballads. Mr. Henley has truly remarked that The Last Buccaneer curiously anticipates some points in the methods of Mr. Kipling. And we do, indeed, think that here Macaulay knew exactly what he wanted, and did it. The sayings and doings of the personages in these ballads are obvious and garish, it is said. But the ballad is essentially a product of a time in which people were dreadfully prone to do obvious things, and in no way concerned to be subtle. Fire, directness, energy of handling—these are the main necessities of the martial ballad, rather than any poetic subtlety; and all these were at Macaulay's command. "Remember thy swashing blow" is the Shakespearian advice which might be given to the writer of the ballad warlike. And Macaulay always remembers his swashing blow. He has none of the deep poetic quality which informs the best work of Mr. Kipling. But he does not aim at it. He keeps within a limit and a kind; and in that kind does very excellent pieces of work; quite honest, healthy work, which may well be allowed to stand, even though a stronger than he be come upon him. On the whole, in spite of modern æsthetic reaction, Macaulay, we think, will surely stand. If not an authentic god, he is at least a demigod, the most brilliant of Philistines, elevated to the Pantheon of literature by virtue of a quite supra-Philistine power. That the middle-class mind, the John Bull mind par excellence, with its superficiality, its love for facts and the practical, its energy, its cock-sureness, should have one representative in that Pantheon is surely reasonable. Macaulay is the Sauric deity of English letters, the artist of the obvious—but an artist none the less.

FRANCIS THOMPSON.

SUBURBAN PANTOMIME.

On two occasions it has been given to me to vex or to astonish my most amiable of friends. He is a "collector," and I asked him, years ago, whether he collected "Battersea." He, a lover of the archaic, a student of the classical—how could he be concerned with the light grace of the eighteenth century, with Battersea enamel, which is not great at all, not ambitious, not instructive, but only exquisite! I asked him, yesterday, whether he had taken his seats for the pantomime. He received the question with inextinguishable laughter. The pantomime!—it was not his affair. Yet people not unknown for wisdom have been wont to delight in it. Mr. Thackeray, I believe, was accustomed to breakfast in bed, the morning after Boxing Day, that he might read, quite undisturbed, the account in the Times newspaper, and picture everything from the dark cavern to the realms of bliss, and from the fairy godmother to the tripping of Columbine before the footlights. Of course the pantomime of the present is no longer the pantomime of Mr. Thackeray's day. The story is less prominent, and at the same time less simple. The humour is less boisterous—shall I add, a little less real? The harlequinade—the very germ of pantomime, as we now know it, for all the rest was described as "the opening"—the harlequinade is a knockabout performance, which, brief as are its proportions, nobody remains to see. The scenery is more elaborate and surprising. No amount of ingenuity is deemed too much to bestow upon the mise-en-scène. For the principal parts, artists in song and comedy, like Miss Decima Moore, and those who are at least the best exponents of music-hall humour, like Mr. Dan Leno, are engaged at, doubtless, reckless expense; while the stage is peopled and paraded on by an army of "supers," and dance succeeds dance, and procession follows procession.

For myself, I go but rarely to see this incomparable and gigantic show. I hold—with no disrespect whatever to those who may perform in it—that pantomime on this vast scale is pantomime marred; that pantomime on this vast scale provides us with surprise instead of pleasure. The true lover of the theatre is a gourmet, not a gourmand, in his tastes for entertainment. He wants quality, rather than mass. And the more experience has made him an expert—the more richly he is endowed with memories which are standards of taste—the more will he rely for his enjoyment upon the really salient and remarkable features of the smaller shows, where he can see them: the more will he recognise that in pantomime, though the ensemble may be much, he gets his real gratification from individual charm and individual talent. Accordingly, nothing is more probable than that the vast central exhibitions know him not at all. He recognises—he recognises, of course, long ago at the Olympic—Mr. Oscar Barrett's extraordinary faculty for artistic effect; but he thinks that in the biggest and newest of pantomime schemes that artistic faculty has had to be in some degree subdued or subordinated to meet the new conditions, and in deference to a standard that has already become conventional as well as exacting. Accordingly, he hies him to the suburbs—to a stage not so vast that most of it is necessarily remote, to a stage whose smaller yet not insignificant manoeuvres fall really and readily within the scope of his eye. He does not find roughness in the suburbs. He does not find vulgarity there. Everywhere, nowadays, the standard in these things is pretty much the same. And he has the interest of seeing, in the suburbs, along with some comic celebrity who really counts in the performance—who is not merely a name in a crowd—two or three less known people, interesting by present achievement, or yet more interesting for promise. At the great central places, specially known names have got to be secured, however small may be the parts assigned to their owners. In the suburbs the manager has a much freer hand, and we see behind his footlights the celebrities of to-morrow.

As a rule, all pantomimes other than central ones draw their support from people living in the district. In the stalls at Camberwell, I felt the other evening—well, I felt that it was Camberwell that I had got to. And I need say no more. At Stratford, last year, where I pilgrimaged to the old Theatre Royal—Stratford "at Bowe," I mean, and not "on Avon"—the lower middle classes filled the dress circle, and those who would have been the occupants of upper boxes in the West-end of London were there the occupants of stalls. But though the audience varied, and was of course socially inferior, I saw little inferiority in the entertainment. At Stratford, the Messrs. Fredericks, whether as managers or actors, are extraordinarily enterprising and capable people. And this year, at their new playhouse—in which, I think, Mr. Beerbohm Tree was the first performer—they have, it would appear, surpassed themselves. The “female interest” is sustained by Miss Millie Hylton of “the halls,” and Miss Kate Fredericks, who I remember was capable and charming just a year ago. Of longer standing reputation among suburban houses are the Surrey “over the water,” and the Grand at Islington. Miss Soldene, whose reminiscences theatrical people have been reading, gave the Grand its first vogue: it was Miss Lottie Collins who made its pantomime famous. This year they play there “Cinderella”—so skilfully contrived altogether that it deserves a visit even from those who live far off. Harry Randall is excellently funny. The men generally, as much as the ladies, pluckily forego the advantage of vulgarity. And Cinderella, the title-part, dear to the heart of every “principal girl” in England, the ideal girl’s part in pantomime, is played by a young and very pretty person, Miss Nita Clavering, who not only “plays” the sympathetic rôle, but really fills it. I have seen great Cinderellas—Cinderellas for whom, at least, in my opinion, a more brilliant future was reserved than that even of marriage

For when I was a boy, in the West of England, I have seen Cinderella played by that great mistress of her art—Mrs. Kendal. And, surely, to be mistress of your art is to be much more than a countess.

Two other theatres—two only, and one of them I have already just named—need be spoken of to show the better characteristics of some modern pantomime. They are the Métropole at Camberwell, and the Theatre Royal, Brighton. Brighton is not “suburban,” it may, of course, be said. No; not suburban in any sense that is disparaging; for it disputes not unsuccessfully with Chelsea the right to be accounted the only suburb in which it is convenient to live. But the Métropole first. Here there is Mr. King, an excellent comic actor, reticent, quaint, full of significance. Very tellingly he plays his part in “Aladdin.” Little Miss Godwynne Earle—a young thing who is sister of Miss Frances Earle, who is doing so well at Newcastle—wears a wig much too large for her, is sympathetically frank, and dances as gracefully as she did two months ago at the Tivoli. There is that about her that is refreshing. Then you have Miss Weston, very pretty and engaging, as the Princess Badroulbador. And as chief dancer you have Miss Topsy Sinden—who by herself justifies the expedition. Miss Topsy Sinden is an accomplished and exquisite dancer of the modern kind entirely, but who can afford to abjure the “Catherine Wheel” imported from the streets and “splits” imported from the Moulin Rouge. Hers is no crude and violent gymnastic, but a perfected art.

At Brighton they have got what they have got at the Surrey—an “electric ballet,” or “aerial ballet”; but really it is not so much a ballet as a flight of coryphées, floating, poised in the high air. The show, which everyone in Brighton visits, and which Londoners rightly delight to go to, is good throughout, with not one trace of the vulgar. But I confess its main interest centres for those who would observe the stage with closeness and discern the favourites of the Future as much as of the Present—for these, I say, its interest centres in Miss Marie Dainton, who, out of the generally somewhat conventional material of a “principal girl’s” part, has somehow managed to make a quite remarkable performance. “Maid Marian,” in the story, has, like Alexander Pope’s woman in general, this for her characteristic—that she has “no character at all.” There is nothing you can take hold of. As Maid Marian Miss Dainton is simple and agreeable. But when she leaves Maid Marian proper, for mock tragedy and mimicry of her compeers, her success is more extraordinary. In a second she has the quaint gaucherie of Eugene Stratton—his walk, his trail rather, his singular holding of his head. Anon she warbles of the gay tom-tit, and Letty Lind is suddenly before you. And then—at once—it is Miss Marie Collins, possessed by the seven devils of her music-hall energy. Later, Miss Dainton gives you a little invention in imaginary tragedy, as spirited and as intense as it is possible to be. Endowed with ample physical qualities, with excellent training, with an obvious intelligence, fresh, vigorous—and I am not sure at all that there is not a touch of genius besides—Miss Marie Dainton, whom one saw a year ago at music-halls, will end, probably (if she does justice to her talent), in more exalted places.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE POET LAUREATE’S QUANTITIES.

London: Jan. 18.

Always verify your references. It is a good rule, and one which even Poets Laureate should remember. In his new poem, “The Conversion of Winkelmann,” Mr. Alfred Austin has only just saved himself at the last moment from what schoolboys call a “howler.” Mr. Austin has occasion to show off a certain amount of classical learning in this poem, and to introduce a certain number of classical names. To get them fairly into the metre is not always easy; but it is not allowable to alter the “quantities.” And Mr. Austin, who is determined (rather pedantically, since the vulgar pronunciation was good enough for Shakespeare) to scan Hyperion with the “i” long, is more especially debarred from taking liberties with his classical names. Yet in the printed page we get this line (page 11):

“They say it is Capaneus scaling Thebes.”

Unfortunately the man’s name was not Capaneus, but Capaneus. Mr. Austin (or his printer’s reader) apparently only discovered this after the volume had gone to press; and a slip was sent round to reviewers correcting the line to:

“They say ’tis Argive Capaneus scaling Thebes.”

Half a dozen lines later the same name occurred, obviously intended to scan in the same way:

“If it were
Capaneus, where the chlamys, helmet, spear,
And forward strain of battle on his face?”

Fortunately the line can still be scanned, though but clumsily, if the name is properly pronounced.

PROF. JASTROW’S PUZZLE.

London: Jan. 17.

If your contributor “H. C. M.” has quoted aright Prof. Joseph Jastrow, of the University of Wisconsin, he shows that the Professor has less than the most elementary and primitive notions on the subject of logic—notions, I should say, that probably belonged to the Stone Age. The absurd little problem to which he invites an answer is as old as Aristotle, and it probably never puzzled any reasonable being for more than five minutes. If all A is all B, B, of course, is A. If all A is part of B, or vice versa, the fallacy is rooted in that known as the fallacy of the Undistributed Middle. If the Professor does not know what that is, and has never read Aristotle, Aquinas, or (say) Liberatore, Jevons is a book within the easy reach of everybody.

VERNON BLACKBURN.

London: Jan. 18.

The syllogistic puzzle of Prof. Joseph Jastrow contained in your issue of last week seems to admit of a clear exposition of its fallacy. The fallacy arises from the ambiguous employment of the word “not.” The expression “not A” should be amended to “not-A”; for “B is not A” is really B belongs to the class not-A.

The figure used is the fourth (though Prof. Jastrow’s conclusion is erroneously expressed), and we may employ either of the moods—Bramantip or Dimaris. Adopting the former, the syllogism runs: All A is B; all B is not-A; ∴ Some not-A is A. Using the second mood we get: Some A is B; all B is not-A; ∴ Some not-A is A. If these syllogisms be expressed graphically by the usual method of circles, the conclusiveness of the reasonings will be obvious. But Prof. Jastrow’s conclusion does not result.

T. E. YOUNG.

Oxford: Jan. 18.

In response to the invitation of Prof. Joseph Jastrow, of the University of Wisconsin, I venture to send my solution of his ingenious problem. The reasoning is not correct. The law of excluded middle cannot be applied to so loose a form of statement as an indefinite proposition. The subject must first be quantified. “B is not A” may mean either “No B is A” or “Some B is not A.” If it means “No B is A” it contradicts “A is B” (which implies “Some B is A”), and therefore cannot be legitimately combined with it in reasoning. On the other hand, if it means “Some B is not A,” the “syllogism” has an undistributed middle, and can yield no conclusion. In neither case, therefore, can the absurdity be deduced that “A is not A.” It would be rising on a mere point of order to add that the so-called syllogism has only two terms. If “B is A” means “Some B is A,” no syllogism is needed to prove it, since it is an immediate inference; if it means “All B is A,” no syllogism can prove it, since it is not a formal inference of any kind, but only a statement which may contingently be true.

Perhaps I may be allowed in return to propound a sophism for the consideration of the Professor. In the unlikely event of his failing to solve it, he must be held responsible for the consequences to public morality.

An indifferent act is not-right,
An indifferent act is not-wrong,
∴ Not-wrong is not-right,
∴ (By contraposition) Right is wrong.

NOTES AND NEWS.

SINCE going to press last week five more replies have reached us to our question, asking for the names of the two books which most pleased and interested their readers in 1896. These are from Miss Ellen Terry, Father Ignatius, the Rev. John Watson (Ian Maclaren), Mr. G. Bernard Shaw, and Mr. W. T. Stead, and are as follows:

MISS ELLEN TERRY.

Weir of Hermiston.
Margaret Ogilvy.

REV. JOHN WATSON (Ian Maclaren).

Margaret Ogilvy (for its tenderness and art).
The Seven Seas (for its patriotism and strength).

FATHER IGNATIUS.

Dr. Grattan Guinness's Creation Centred in Christ.
The Mighty Atom.

MR. W. T. STEAD.

The Report of the Dublin Recess Committee.
Huysman's En Route, in Mr. Kegan Paul's translation.

MR. G. BERNARD SHAW drops as usual into a personal statement: "I only," he says, "read one book—Harold Frederic's Illumination—in 1896. It pleased and interested me to an extent that would have taken away my breath in the days when I used to read instead of write; but I suppose everybody could do that now. Anyhow, it was a very good novel."

MR. RICHARD R. HOLMES has not his first association with royalties as biographer to the Queen. He it was, if we mistake not, who drew the portrait of King Theodore of Abyssinia after death, photographs of which were familiar at the time in the shop windows. Mr. Holmes was a war correspondent before he was Librarian to the Queen.

In a little Franciscan magazine—likely to reach only a small portion of Mr. Coventry Patmore's admirers—appears a friar's estimate of him as a poet and as a man. Among other charming stories there told by Father Anselm is one of a visit which he himself, Mr. Patmore, and Mr. Francis Thompson together paid to the library of a very famous monastery. The clerical librarian was full of apologies for the space given to theology, and he was proceeding to direct the attention of his visitors to one after another of the works of modern secular writers—including some of their own. Mr. Coventry Patmore could suffer it no longer. With the twinkle that used to change his eye on the instant from blue to dark, he said: "Thompson and I don't care for literature. Show us your theology."

WE are officially informed that the legal representatives of Lord Byron and Lady Byron, for family reasons, acting in concert, desire to make it known that they have decided to exercise their rights of controlling the publication of all letters and documents to which those rights extend. They therefore give notice that they will take such legal steps as may be necessary to prevent the unauthorised publication of any papers by or relating to George Gordon, Lord Byron, and his wife Lady Byron.

MISS KATHARINE DOUGLAS KING has just completed a new story, which will be published by Messrs. Hutchinson under the name of Father Hilarion later in the year. The story, which is a good deal longer than the same writer's Scripture Reader of St. Mark's, deals also with the conditions of life among the London poor. The hero of the book is "Father" only by nickname; he is a lay worker in the slums.

No news this week was more welcome than that assuring the safety of Mr. Stephen Crane. It seems that on the foundering of the Commodore some of those on board were successful in getting away in boats and reaching New Smyrna. Mr. Crane was among these. His new book, The Little Regiment, will be published by Mr. Heinemann very shortly.

HAD Mr. Shorter been at the annual meeting of the Brontë Society on Saturday, at Bradford, there would have been an interesting encounter between him and Dr. William Wright, who, in a paper he read, warmly resented Mr. Shorter's recent criticism on his book on the Brontës in Ireland. He considers that he has acted fairly, and been guided by the usual rules in dealing with traditional evidence. Even if Dr. Wright's contention is admitted, and the germ of some of the stories is found in the family traditions known to the gifted sisters, the explanation carries us little further in accounting for the wonderful genius of the family.

It has been proved that the Brontës' skill in storytelling was hereditary, and their residence in Yorkshire was but an accidental circumstance in their history. The sisters, and especially Charlotte, nevertheless succeeded in understanding and depicting the Yorkshire character, and the firmness with which the Society has taken root in the West Riding, shows how hearty is the respect paid to the memory of the family. The membership is now 260, and the museum is in a thriving financial condition. The views shown at Saturday's meeting, by Mr. J. J. Head, of Heckmondwike, were 148 in number, and most exhaustively illustrated the lives of the Brontës and their works. Mr. Head has been to Brussels, Bridlington, Hathersage, and many other places near and far, in his search for illustrations, and several of his views have a unique value.

CONTINUING his autobiographical chapters in the Atlantic Monthly, Colonel Higginson this month reaches the New England Transcendentals and Brook Farm. He tells incidentally one or two rather good stories, one being of Prof. Dicey and Mr. Bryce, M.P., on their first visit to America. "One day," says the Colonel, "Dicey came in rubbing his hands, and saying with eagerness, 'Bryce is very happy; at the Ocean House he has just heard a man say European twice!'" Another refers to a college youth who was an ardent Fourierite, and "had upon his" door a blazing sun, with gilded rays emanating in all directions, and bearing the motto, 'Universal Unity.' Beneath this appeared a neat black-and-white inscription, thus worded: 'Please wipe your feet.'"

In an article in the Chap Book (which, though grouped by the Critic with the "Fad periodicals," where we grieve to find also our own cis-Atlantic Yellow Book, is about to become a considerable magazine) there is a pleasant essay on "The Rustic Muse," and in it we find this rather cruel thrust at Mr. Howells. The rustic man of letters, says the writer, "cannot see how Mr. Howells can carry Count Tolstoi on his back, and at the same time manage to write delicate little novels in which a bloodless young man and an egregiously anæmic young girl come very near doing something about which they hold long conversations and never mention it." Coming from an English critic this would pass—but from a fellow American!

THE obliging novelist flourishes—or at least exists—in Germany as he does, we trust, nowhere else. Herr A. Jahn's Literary Institute is ready to give him the fullest employment, and apparently very little in return; for it is able to offer to editors brand new romances at the rate of five shillings for as many thousand lines. Herr Jahn also publishes a Feuilleton Journal at five marks for thirteen numbers. "Every number contains one large romance (serial), one elegant novel (serial), one concise humorous piece or short story. Each number comprises five to seven pages, and contains from 800 to 1,050 lines of letterpress. Subscriptions may commence at any date. Each new subscriber immediately receives the beginning of the romance, &c. Subscriptions payable in advance, or will be raised after the first number. Each subscriber is entitled to reprint all the contents at any date he pleases. The publication is not sent simultaneously to competing journals." Painful and improper stories are, says Herr Jahn, excluded. Our contemporary The Author, in the interests of the craft, is intending to make some searching inquiries into this literary institute.

THOSE readers who, like Mr. "Punch," according to his own confession, have found it hard to come to those delightful books A Cathedral Courtship and Timothy's Quest because the name of the author is Kate Douglas Wiggin, may be glad to know that this lady has recently changed her name, and is now and henceforward Mrs. Riggs.

THE Boston Library, for which, by the way, our new R.A., Mr. John S. Sargent, designed the decorations, is a singularly fortunate establishment. At the end of the current list of additions to the shelves we find a list of benefactions lately bestowed which would almost fill Mr. Passmore Edwards with envy. A Miss Auty, of Chicago, has given a sum of ten thousand dollars; the late Mr. Charles Mead has left twenty-five hundred dollars; Dr. W. N. Bullard has presented some early illuminated works; Mr. and Mrs. Codman have given a notable library of landscape architecture; and the late Mrs. Bessie S. Lockwood has bequeathed sixteen hundred and forty-three volumes of historical interest. This is a good record.

If Mr. Grant Allen, Sir Walter Besant, Miss Braddon, and Mr. Hall Caine are still unaware of some of their characteristics, they might do worse than consult an article in the Phrenological Annual. There they will find the conclusions to which a gentleman has come after studying their photographs. He finds, for example, that Mr. Grant Allen is "likely to get himself much misunderstood, because he has the courage of his convictions"; and that he is "not likely to dogmatise or lay down the law." Mr. Allen must, in this case, be thinking of materially altering his methods. "He would prize," we are told, "to succeed as a philosopher rather than a novelist." Sir Walter Besant, the phrenologist thinks, would have risen to eminence in any walk of life. He is "about as keen an observer as the late Charles Dickens, but cannot be regarded as a profound thinker." Mr. Hall Caine's mind is "prophetic," and generally we gather that he is very high-toned. He has "Sympathy and Spirituality and Wonder," all spelt with capital letters. It is amazing what a photograph will reveal!

A good story of Ruskin crops up in an illustrated interview with Sir Arthur Arnold in The Young Man for February. Sir Arthur recalled his feeling of discouragement when in the course of a lecture on architecture and art Mr. Ruskin took a piece of chalk and drew some vine leaves for the capital of a column, saying: "A man who cannot draw like that, at all events, should not think of being an architect." A lady who was present, wishing to bring herself under Ruskin's notice, thereupon asked him how long it would take her to paint a plum like one of William Hunt's. Mr. Ruskin's reply was memorable: "About eight hours a day for forty years, madam."

THE relative popularity of British novelists in America is a subject on which statistics are still comparatively dumb. Our most ardent admirers of Mr. Marion Crawford's novels may be surprised to learn how many people there are in America who are of the same mind as themselves about this agreeable writer's books. Some figures which come in the current New York Critic show that upwards of half-a-million copies of Mr. Crawford's works have been sold in the States. Mr. Crawford's first success, Mr. Isaacs, is there in its fifty-third thousand, while Saracinesca has actually found more than 110,000 purchasers across the Atlantic. Mr. Crawford's other works have been appreciated by American readers in the following order: Sant' Ilario, Don Orsino, Dr. Claudius, Katherine Lauderdale, The Three Fates, The Ralstons, Casa Braccio, Pietro Ghisleri. We are surprised that A Roman Singer does not stand higher.

By a printer's error, the title of Mr. H. G. Wells's latest novel appeared in Messrs. J. M. Dent & Co's advertisement as "The Wheels of Change." The Wheels of Change would not make a bad title for a story, but everyone knows that Mr. Wells wrote of the wheels of Chance.

A CORRESPONDENT draws our attention to the omission in the article on Leigh Hunt in last week's ACADEMY of his sonnet on the Nile; which, he says, "more than anything else he did entitles its author to the sacred name of poet." The sonnet is well known, but in deference to our correspondent we reproduce it here:

"It flows through old hushed Egypt and its sands Like some grave mighty thought threading a dream,
And times and things, as in that vision seem
Keeping along it their eternal stands—
Caves, pillars, pyramids, the shepherd bands That roamed through the young world, the glory extreme
Of high Sesostriis, and that southern beam,
The laughing queen that caught the world's great hands.
"Then comes a mightier silence, stern and strong,
As of a world left empty of its throng,
And the void weighs on us; and then we wake,
And hear the fruitful stream lapsing along 'Twixt villages, and think how we shall take
Our own calm journey on for human sake."

It may not be generally known that this sonnet was the outcome of a competition in sonnet making between Hunt, Shelley, and Keats. Hunt's sonnet was the best.

A WRITER in The Philistine has been inquiring into the statistics of births and deaths in fiction. He finds the proportion of annual births to deaths is as one to 796. At this rate, he says, the story-tellers will depopulate the earth in eleven years, figured out mathematically. Dickens, he continues, is the only author that ever lived who tried to hold the balance true. For every undertaker that he brings on the scene he introduces a midwife. Mr. Lang should note this point, if he has not already done so, for the "Gadshill" edition!

DUNDEE is associated in song with bonnets rather than books, but books hold sway there to-day. An exhibition of literary relics of Shakespeare, Burns, and Scott from the collection of Mr. A. C. Lamb, the well-known antiquarian of that town, has been opened, and it appears to be rich in interesting books. Among these are three of the Shakespeare folios—the second of 1632, the third of 1684, and the fourth of 1685. There are also early copies of single plays:

"The Merchant of Venice" (1637), "Pericles, Prince of Tyre" (1630), and others. A snuff-box made from Shakespeare's mulberry-tree, and once the property of Garrick, is also shown; while Dundee is connected with Shakespeare by the exhibition of three volumes of the works of Hector Boece, who was born in Dundee in the middle of the fifteenth century, and wrote books with which Shakespeare is known to have studied. The Burns and Scott exhibits are numerous and interesting, the former including a unique partially uncut copy of the Kilmarnock edition of 1786 in its original paper covers.

LORD ROBERTS's book, Forty-one Years in India, has entered its eighth edition.

MRS. H. M. STANLEY will contribute an article to the February number of The Art Journal on "Bastien Lepage in London," with reproductions of some sketches made by the French peasant artist during a visit. The number will also contain an etching by Mr. David Law, after Corot's "Souvenir d'Italie."

MESSRS. W. BLACKWOOD & SONS will publish on Monday The Land of the Dollar, by George W. Steevens, who has collected under this title the series of articles which he wrote as special correspondent of the Daily Mail during the Presidential election.

IN Blackwood's Magazine for February will be found an article from the pen of Miss Beatrice Harraden, entitled "Some Impressions of Southern California."

It is not surprising that Miss Marie Corelli is the envy of some of her fellow novelists. Of her forthcoming romance, Ziska, although it is not due till the 15th of next month, 35,000 copies have been already bespoken. Mr. J. W. Arrowsmith is the publisher.

PROF. WALTER RALEIGH will contribute to the forthcoming number of Cosmopolis an essay entitled "The Battle of the Books." M. Edouard Rod will write on "The Intellectual Movements in France."

THE author of Uncle Remus has been engaged for some time on a story in a very different genre. The title is Sister Jane, and Mr. Harris is reported to be despondent about it. Those who have seen the MS. are, however, most enthusiastic. Authors are notoriously such bad judges of their work that we expect something very good.

JUDGE O'CONNOR MORRIS's work on Hannibal will soon appear in Messrs. Putnam's "Heroes Series." It will be a companion volume to the author's Napoleon in the same series.

MR. S. R. CROCKETT's new novel, Lad's Love, is to be published by Bliss, Sands & Co. Less than one-third of it has appeared in the serial form. For the first time one of Mr. Crockett's novels will be issued illustrated, Lad's Love containing sixteen wash-drawings by Mr. Warwick Goble.

THE BOOK MARKET.

EDUCATIONAL PUBLISHING.

IT is doubtful whether any one man in London is in a position to realise the magnitude of the educational publishing trade. Educational books flow out to their users by special channels. Though they are published by the firms that issue ordinary literature, they do not, like general books, go in bulk to the distributing houses and to the booksellers. Vast quantities are sent direct from the publisher's to the school-room. Yet it is hardly to the publishers that one can go to obtain a wide view of the educational output. Each publisher is immersed in his own publications, while competition assumes a new meaning and intensity in the educational trade. For whereas when a publisher brings out a standard work in general literature he monopolises the book, and to some extent the book monopolises its subject; it is different when he publishes a French dictionary, or a manual of physics, or an atlas. He then brings out a book which must compete with a dozen other books prepared and floated with precisely the same object as his own publication. That object is to give the best educational treatment to the subject in question, and thus win the support of the largest number of schoolmasters. Yet the plain man will want to know why in the majority of cases one manual is not as good as another. The text of Horace, for instance, is for ever the text of Horace, and there is no royal road to understanding it. One might suppose that the necessary aids had long ago been formulated, that the best scholarship had been tapped, and that a single standard text of Horace had run out of its copyright, and was everywhere published with the same gloss and everywhere in use. But the game of education is a keen one, none keener; and hence we find that a large number of "Horaces" are competing for school use. Five publishers' catalogues now lie before us, each of which offers Horace's Odes, or some portion of them, edited by a different hand, to the British schoolboy. The British schoolboy being million-headed can consume them all. But the lion's share goes to the lion publisher; and that is where the battle grows hot. Horace, who stole away from competition, and wrote in his large leisure, is hustled when he enters the educational hurly-burly.

Ab uno disce omnes. Consider all the other Latin classics, the Greek classics, the grammars, the modern languages, the mathematics, the sciences. Over six hundred new books classifiable as Philological, Classical, and Educational were published during last year—two per working day. It is an axiom of publishing that an established school book is a fine property. The demand for copies may become enormous. Cassell's French Dictionary is in its four-hundred-and-ninetieth thousand.

As a cause of production it should be observed, too, that the mortality among school books is very great; so many are used as missiles, and so many as drawing-books, and so many as blotters. Traddles, it will be remembered, made his books a picture gallery of skeletons, and every school has several Traddles whose ravages must be repaired.

But the most potent factor in multiplying school books is, simply, the vigour of the educational movement, which is ever extending curricula, or uniting learning to taste. Books are now thumbed in our schools which a quarter of a century ago were only found in the libraries of gentlemen and scholars. Our schoolboys read—with vastly more care than many of them ever will in their after lives—Shakespeare, Spenser, Milton, Cowper, and Burke. They find time to read Thomson's Seasons; and they snatch an early and correct delight—too early and correct one doubts—from Elia. Only the other day we received a selection of Matthew Arnold's poems edited and annotated for school use. Or take the domain of geography. Compare the text-books and atlases of to-day with those of twenty-five years ago. Look at the physical and political maps which are now included in every atlas. Some of us seem to remember a time when physical geography was not invented—yet we are young—and when politics dictated "sides" in a tug-of-war or a snow-ball fight, but were otherwise unappreciated. And whereas a geography book then included in its survey the world from China to Peru, now patriotism and prudence assign a separate and bulky manual to the British Isles, and another to our Colonies, and others to the great areas of the world. Many of the school atlases of Messrs. George Philip & Sons are now supplied with maps of European capitals, and the day may be near when a handy geographical text-book on London may be adopted by the London School Board for use in its schools.

THE BOOK SALES OF 1896.

It would be idle for me to attempt, in the columns of the ACADEMY, even a partial survey of the "book sales" of the past year. In the first place, I should require a whole issue; and, in the second place, it would serve little or no good purpose. It will be better if I state the results of my own study, and illustrate them with a few examples from the more important libraries which were dispersed.

So far as the collections sold are concerned, the past year is not specially distinguished. Still, there were four or five which deserve singling out for more particular mention. These are: the Frere Library (February 14, 15, 16, 17, and 18); a collection of "various properties," sold in the same month; Mr. Farmer Atkinson's Biblical and liturgical collection (March); Mr. A. Crampon's library (June); the "library of a gentleman" (November), and the collection from the libraries of Arthur Young, Howell Wills, and Sir T. N. Dick-Lauder (December). Of these the Frere Library has undoubted historic interest. The Bunbury sale and the sale of duplicates from Earl Crawford's library are also interesting. Lord Coleridge's library (May) and the collection made by the late Mr. Alexander Macmillan furnish material for study of an important character.

From an examination of these and all the other sales which have occurred I have come to the following conclusions:

(1) An increasing interest, and a consequent increase in price, of first editions of books which may be classed as "English literature."

(2) A revival of the mania for extra-illustrated books.

(3) A continued interest in "Americana."

(4) A continued interest in illustrated sporting books.

(5) A demand for first editions of Kipling and Stevenson.

(6) A passing away of the fashion for books by Richard Jefferies, and for large-paper copies of modern works.

Other points occur to me, but to illustrate them would take up more space than is desirable. I can only briefly touch upon them. Topographical books are still in demand, but the prices paid for the rarer works are not of so high an average as in past years. Blake's illustrated books are in great demand. Collectors of fine bindings are not wanting. The craze for Dickens and Thackeray is losing hold of collectors; and the Cruikshank miser is going the way of all flesh.

And now let me illustrate my six points:

(1) Ben Jonson's "Masque of Queenes" (1609), £20; Dr. Donne's "Sermons" (1640, Walton's copy), £17; Donne's "Poems" (1635), £8 5s. [O'Flahertie's Sale, Jan.].

Ben Jonson's "His Case Altered," and "The Alchemist" (1609-12), £31; Shakespeare's "Pericles" (1609), £171; Spenser's "Faerie Queene" and "Colin Clout" (1596), £24 [The Frere Sale, Feb.].

Burns's "Poems" (Kilmarnock, 1786), £121; Goldsmith's "Traveller" (1764), £96; Hayward's "The Sanctuarie of a Troubled Soule" (1616), £19; Dr. Johnson's "The Idler" (1761, L.P.), £14 15s.; Shirley's "Poems" (1646), £10 10s.; Chaucer's "Tales" (Caxton, 1478?), £1,020 ["Various Properties" Feb. and March].

Milton's "Paradise Lost," £85; Florio's "Montaigne" (1603), £23 10s.; Nash's "First Parte of Pasquill's Apologie" (1590), £15 10s.; Sterne's "Sentimental Journey" (1768, L.P.), £22 10s. [A Collector's Library, March].

Shelton's "Don Quixote" (1612-20), £35; "Shakespeare" (fourth folio, £55; Wycherley's "Miscellany Poems" (1704), £46 [Duke of Leeds, April].

Browning's "Pauline" (1833), £145; Byron's "Poems" (1807, L.P.), £45; Byron's "Hours of Idleness" (1807, L.P.), £20; "English Bards" (fourth edition) £29; Byron's "Waltz" (1813), £55; Coleridge's "Poems" (1796, with his receipt for copyright), £20; Cowper's "Poems" and "Task" (1782-85), £16 15s.; Daniel's "Civille Warres" (1609), £11 15s.; De Witt's "Robinson Crusoe" (1719-20), £55; Defoe's "Moll Flanders" (1721), £10 15s.; Drayton's "Battaile of Agincourt" (1562), £11 5s.; Fielding's "Tom Jones" (1749), £11 10s.; Goldsmith's "Vicar of Wakefield" (1766), £65; "Deserted Village" (1770), £25; Hallam's "Poems" (1830), £36; Herrick's "Hesperides" (1648), £38; Keats's "Poems" (1817), £21 10s.; Keats's "Lamia" (1820), £11 10s.; Lamb and Lloyd's "Blank Verse" (1798), £10 10s.; "Tales from Shakespeare" (1807), £13 13s.; "Mrs. Leicester's School" (1809), £12 10s.; Landor's "Poems" (1795), £19 15s.; Landor's "Poems" (1798), £16 16s.; Marlowe's "All Ovid's Elegies" (1596), £18 10s.; Milton's "Lycidas" (1638), £87; Milton's "Poems" (1641), £51; "Paradise Lost" (1667), £90; Poe's "Raven" (1845), £51; Quarles' "Argalus," &c. (1636), £30; Shelley's "Address to the Irish People" (1812), £42; "Œdipus Tyrannus" (1820), £130; "Adonais" (1821), £42; Spenser's "Faerie Queene" (1590-96), £85; Spenser's "Complaints" (1591), £27; "Colin Clout" (1595), £21 10s.; "Tristram Shandy" (1700-67), £20; Suckling's "Fragmenta Aurea" (1646), £14; Tennyson's "The Window" (1867), £52; Tennyson's "The Victim" (1867), £75; Wordsworth's "Grace Darling" (1838), £32 [A. Crampon's Sale, June].

Burns's "Poems" (Kilmarnock, 1786), £70; Chaucer's "Tales" (Caxton, 1478?), £1,880; Shakespeare's "Works," second folio, £75; third folio, £43, and fourth folio, £34 [Sale of various properties, June].

Holinshed's "Chronicle" (1577), £106; Shelton's "Don Quixote" (1612-20), £35; Walton's "Angler" (1653), £415 [Wills & Lauder Sale, Dec.].

(2) Crowe and Cavalcaselle's "Painting in Italy" (1864-71), £15 10s.; Waagen's "Treasures of Art" (1854-57), £40 [Scharf Sale, Feb.].

Ames's "Typographical Antiquities" (Fenn's copy), £248 [Frere Sale, Feb.]. Foster's "Life of Dickens," £252 [Feb.]. Gillray's "Caricatures," £59 [J. C. Smith, Jan.].

(3) De la Garde's "Simple Cobbler of Aggawam" (1647), £5 5s. [O'Flahertie, Jan.].

Eliot's "Indian Bible" (imperfect), £20 [American Books Sale, Jan.].

Cieza de Leon's "Chronica del Peru" (1553), £12 12s.; Morton's "New England's Memorials," £50 [Feb.].

Pynchon's "Price of Man's Redemption" (1655), £15 10s. [March].

Eliot's "Indian Bible," £82; Hubbard's "Troubles with the Indians" (1677), £111 [June].

Raleigh's "Discoverie of Guiana" (1596), with Harcourt's "Voyage to Guiana" (1626), £51; Smith's "Virginia" (1625), £204 [Bunbury Sale, July].

Vespuccio's Letter on "Mundus Novus" (1504), £176 [Dec.].

(4) Apperley's "Hunters" (1831), £4 10s.; Dobson's "Kunopædia" (1814), £7 10s.; Apperley's "Life of a Sportsman" (1857), £6; Alken's "Hunting Field" (1846), £6; Surtees' "Handley Cross" (1854), £6 15s.; Markham's "Pleasures of Princes" (1635), £7 10s.; Markham's "Country Contentments" (1631), £11; Egan's "Book of Sports" (1832), £15 15s. ["Various Properties," Feb.].

Fulke's "Philosopher's Game" (1563), with Rowbotham's "Cheastes" (1569), £27 10s. [Bunbury Sale, July].

Walton's "Angler" (Third Edition, 1661), £37; Walton's "Angler" (First Edition, 1653), £415 [Dec.].

Several copies of Surtees' novels, in the original parts, brought good prices.

(5) A set of Stevenson's works brought £67; the same author's "Charity Bazaar," £15; Kipling's first publications, those in Wheeler's "Indian Railway Library," are bringing as much as £1 each. The rare Anglo-Indian Civil and Military Gazette, to which Kipling, his father, mother, and sister contributed, sold in December for £15. This is the first recorded appearance of this work in a sale-room.

(6) I need only point out that "The Story of my Heart," which used to bring £1 10s. and £2, sold in Messrs. Puttick & Simpson's rooms, in January, for 3s. But most of Mr. Jefferies' books are bringing such small prices that I have been compelled to omit them from my volume on the "Book Sales of 1896."

With regard to "Large Paper" editions, a comparison of their published prices with those they realise at sales must be a heart-breaking task to their possessors. The fates seem to be dealing very unkindly in this matter, with Mr. Andrew Lang's works in particular. Again and again these bring but a few shillings.

NEW BOOKS RECEIVED.

VERY few works appear in our list this week under "Theology," or "Biography," or "History." Perhaps the most notable section is "Travel," which gives us Mr. Arthur P. Harper's Pioneer Work in the Alps of New Zealand (Fisher Unwin); Miss Mary H. Kingsley's record of her Travels in West Africa (Macmillans), and Mr. G. W. Steevens's The Land of the Dollar, which will be issued to the public on Monday. Mr. Steevens's book consists of a reprint of his recent remarkable letters to the Daily Mail. Under "Miscellaneous" will be found such diverse works as Famous British Warships and their Commanders, by Walter Wood (Hurst & Blackett); Mr. J. H. Slater's Book Prices Current (Elliot Stock); Armenia and Europe, by Dr. J. Lepsius (Hodder & Stoughton); and The Sacred Tree, by Mrs. J. H. Philpot (Macmillans). The last-named work deals with the part which the tree has played in primitive religion. Mrs. Philpot writes that "no other form of Pagan ritual has been so widely distributed, has left behind it such persistent traces, or appeals so closely to modern sympathies, as the worship of the tree."

THEOLOGY.

VILLAGE SERMONS. By the late F. J. A. Hort, D.D. Macmillan & Co. 6s.

ART.

THE Landscape Exhibition at the Dudley Gallery this winter is the welcome second of a series to which we wish all success. An average of a dozen or more of landscapes by each of a group of six painters, who have manifestly not come together by chance, presents landscape painting in an unusually peaceful aspect. The first glance at twilights, tree-tops, and winged skies prepares us to be pleased, and we have a grateful former association of thoughts with the names of McLachlan, Hill, Peppercorn, Allan, Waterlow, and Leslie Thomson. We do not forget, particularly, that some years ago, when there was no other—nearly no other—"execution" in the whole of the Royal Academy, no other grace of touch in the texture of foliage or foreground grass, there was yet Mr. Leslie Thomson's. When Mr. Vicat Cole's brush seemed to yield all the delicacy, all the elegance, for which there was any demand, a little green picture here and there, signed by the not popular name, gave assurance that the art of beautiful painting—as distinguished from a general resolve to paint a beautiful picture—had not entirely lapsed. Mr. Leslie Thomson was really more conspicuous than people who passed his work over, with others they thought it resembled, at all suspected!

MR. T. HOPE MCLACHLAN has movement and vapour in the skies of "Storm at Sundown" and "The Pool"; and in the latter are tenderly and slenderly drawn tree-stems and a fine horizon. "Quiet Night" shows a flock of sheep with the light of a beautifully mingled sky upon their many fleeces. Even with good will towards the long-forgotten idea of imaginative landscape, one may hesitate about "Isles of the Sea." But "Backwater near the Trossachs" is literal enough, and very fresh and emphatic. In "The Wave" Mr. McLachlan has given graceful expression to a little nature-fancy which is simple enough to have occurred to a painter before, but which is all his own; this is that the wave, at the highest of its crest, is an Undine figure erect, upreared, "steadying" on, as the Ancient Mariner says, straight from head to foot. The movement, well suggested, is that of a tall wave, and the water delicately painted.

THERE is, perhaps, nothing better in the work of Mr. R. W. Allan, R.W.S., than his peculiarly intelligent drawing of poplars. He has the spirit of those trees so well that if you have forgotten the look, the air, of them in France (though you know their shapes), Mr. Allan will give you back the very person of the poplar. Good white sunshine fills the scene "On the Loing," but "Chelsea" does not please us so well. Mr. James S. Hill makes his skies interesting, but hardly seems to give them that difference from the landscape, which is, after all, the most conspicuous and patent of all the patent facts of nature. He follows in this some of the French Romantiques, who entangled their vivid shattered skies in the very substance of their forests. A little lack of light seems somewhat to spoil our pleasure in "Christchurch," but this, "Under Repair," "Filey Beach," and the large picture, "Across the Sand Dunes," are all notable works. So are the peculiarly brilliant flower-studies; "Double Tulips" and "Peonies and Daffodils" are wonderfully free (without insolence) in execution, and in illumination and colour radiant and fresh.

WITH "Golden Autumn" Mr. E. A. Waterlow, A.R.A., won the gold medal at Berlin last year. It is a work of great unity and glow, with the autumn privilege of gold in the sunshine made quite the most of; but, because of what seems to a sky-lover a certain poverty and indecision in the sky, we prefer to this important picture such secondary works as "A Forest Path, Barbizon," "A Forest Glade, Fontainebleau," "A Little Farm, Tintagel," and "A Wet Day"—the last two especially, for their great grace of touch. Mr. Leslie Thomson, R.I., seems to us to be at his best in the spacious and simple "Holyhead Mountain," with its fleeting and atmospheric sky, and in "Wareham," which has a full river—the painter makes us feel the brimmingness. The criticism against "St. Vaast-de-la-Hogue" might be that the sunshine is presented rather "sensationally"; for, however all-intense a natural noon may be, it is surely never that. The tendency to great emphasis is evident also in "Ardfern."

It is to Mr. Peppercorn that attaches the interest of this little collection. His work grows in beauty and in power, and "A Cornfield" marks the highest point. Mystery in darkened trees and fugitive clouds is obvious; but in this beautiful work there is a more essential mystery of tone and light. Exceedingly powerful is "The Pool," with its threatening lights of broken sky. But here again is one of the Romantic skies; it is full, various, and brilliant; but you greatly admire it, as you would a fine plaque of metal, for its splendid incidents of surface. Less celestial still is the sky of the simply and very completely painted little picture, "A Tranquil Sea." Seldom has a grey rock on a grey day been painted with so much truth, power, and sobriety; it is at once a study and a picture. "The Lane" has the less unusual qualities of this admirable painter in great perfection; and everywhere he proves the possession of artistic sincerity, which means sincerity worth having. The whole exhibition, finally, shows artistic love of nature (which is a love worth showing), and generally temperate ambitions—but for a suggestion from Mr. Hope McLachlan.

THE six artists have taken for the motto of their gallery a saying of Mr. Ruskin's: "No good work whatever can be perfect; and the demand for perfection is always a sign of a misunderstanding of the ends of Art." True as this is, it is rather an unnecessary truth for all those who have ever confessed the limitations of the material wherewith all artists, in all arts, do their work. This once granted—this inevitable "imperfection" once recognised—it is perfection within the powers of the material, rather than general imperfection, that should be proposed to the student. He ought to hope for perfection according to the capacity of the thing he is working with. The "fine dissatisfaction" with his own work, which is popularly and conventionally expected from a true artist, is surely the result not so much of honourable striving and humility as of hopes too vaguely broadcast, and of the aiming at ends too scattered and too far apart. Such vagueness and such scattering do not fall to the lot of him who knows that he can do all possible things by observing one rule—direction—and that if he never tries to go further than his material, he will go far.

THE "25" is a little exhibition in Soho-square of pencil-drawings, tintings, etchings, lithographs, and other light things, reproduced or reproducible. There is a somewhat significant comparison to be made between eccentric and prankish art in these forms by French hands in this collection, and its late notorious imitations in young English illustrated quarterlies. There is a foundation of drawing in the work of Louis Legrand, F. Rops, C. Maurin, Henri de Toulouse Lautrec, in their degree, and, in fact, of all the company, which must make certain illustrations and caricatures, given to London during the last two or three years, look, to all eyes, as puerile as they have always appeared to eyes well educated. The drawings of Adolf Menzel vouch for an old and European reputation by their excellent draughtsmanship and by the rare dramatic attitude, the living action, of his groups, as in "The Child Jesus in the Synagogue," with half a dozen of the studies of old Jews full of familiar expression. "Two London-street Hebrews" of Mr. Raven Hill, by the way, are also excellent in expressiveness.

MR. E. A. WALTON is successful with an impression of a "Flower Girl" at Kensington, inspired from Japan, and coloured with the very red, soft, and a little golden of a Japanese picture; also with a like quality in his blue in "Lamp-light." A series of Mr. Phil May's studies in black and white prove again his grotesque faithfulness to the truth of London character. The "Two Little Fisher Maids" of M. E. Delatre, fishing in a tank within a grille, make what some people choose to call a pretty pattern, with sun and simplicity besides. M. F. Rops frightens three exquisite cupids, fluttering wings of the most vivid spirit and grace of drawing, by the appearance of a model of revolting physique led by a pig in leash.

A WORD of praise should be said also for Mr. A. S. Hartrick's illustrations of a prize-fight; for the sunned daisies and hawthorn of "Moulin Huet Bay," by Mr. W. H. Byles; and for the greater part of M. L. Legrand's work, and M. C. Maurin's.

MUSIC.

TSCHAIKOWSKY'S Symphony in B minor was the special item in Mr. Henschel's third concert last Thursday week. In selecting that work Mr. Henschel not only challenged direct comparison with Dr. Richter, but with the German conductor at his very best. The latter created a profound impression when he first gave that Symphony, and in each subsequent performance fully maintained his reputation. Mr. Henschel's reading, though not equal in breadth and vis viva, was in many respects praiseworthy, especially that of the second and fourth movements. He has carefully studied and pondered over the meaning of the music. His conception of the work may be every whit as good as that of Dr. Richter, yet he cannot, apparently, transmit his thoughts and feelings with the same directness and intensity.

MISS ILONA EIBENSCHÜTZ gave a clever rendering of Grieg's characteristic pianoforte Concerto in A minor. Her reading of the music was clear and brilliant, though she did not, perhaps, fully realise the composer's intentions. The Concerto is one of those works in which almost everything depends upon the style of interpretation; it ought really to be studied under the guidance of the composer himself. In some works the thoughts are so deep, the developments so interesting, that the music per se attracts. In Grieg's Concerto, which is characteristic, is not in the highest sense of the term great, composer and performer seem almost of equal importance.

BETHOVEN'S "Elegiac Ode" for four voices and strings (Op. 118) was repeated by desire. Though not one of the composer's great works, it charms by its expressiveness and simplicity. It was written in memory of Eleonora Pasqualati. The vocalists, Mrs. Henschel, Miss Gondar, Messrs. W. Ford and G. Holmes, sang carefully, but their voices were not well balanced.

THE programme included Schumann's "Genoveva" Overture and Wagner's Overture to "Tannhäuser," two works very different in kind, yet each in its own way great. Mr. Henschel was more successful with the first.

TSCHAIKOWSKY is all the fashion just now, and Mr. Chappell on Monday introduced into the répertoire of the Popular Concerts the composer's Quartet for strings in D (Op. 11), which was originally produced in London, I believe, by Mr. Gompertz, a season or two back. Why does Mr. Chappell move so cautiously? Musicians would readily forgive a mistake now and then in the choice of work if he were always trying to find attractive novelties, or even to revivify many old works unjustly neglected. Much could be done in either direction, and with gain, not loss, to the enterprise itself. The two middle movements of the Quartet—the graceful, but intensely plaintive, Andante, and the sprightly Scherzo—were exceedingly well rendered by Lady Hallé and MM. Ries, Gibson, and Piatti; the same, however, can scarcely be said of the opening and closing sections. The artists did not then play as if they cared much for the music.

M. SLIVINSKI was the pianist, and his solo, Schumann's "Carneval." Mme. Schumann's rendering of that tone-poem has naturally been held up as a model: no one better felt the varying moods, or better understood the meaning of the music, than she; and then there was living sympathy with the composer which gave special intensity to her playing. So long as I am able to remember her performance of the Carneval, and that remembrance is still vivid, I do not expect to grow enthusiastic over any other reading. With that feeling I try to be as generous as possible, to overlook any little slip; to accept as a sign of individuality, rather than as a fault, any deviation from the tempi and phrasing of Schumann's widow. And yet, with extenuating circumstances raised to their highest power, I must confess that I did not like M. Slivinski's rendering. It lacked tenderness and poetry, and, moreover, was not always note-perfect. A pianist cannot always be in the right vein. M. Slivinski is a talented player, and can, I feel sure, render more justice to himself.

I STAYED to hear the first movement of Rubinstein's pianoforte Trio in B flat, and I was again disappointed. The playing seemed unusually tame. And thus my impression was confirmed that M. Slivinski was not at his best on that particular evening.

MISS THUDICHUM sang in an intelligent manner songs by Gounod, Alfred May, and Massenet. Gounod's "Répénitir," however, is scarcely suitable for a concert of this kind.

MR. FREDERICK LAMOND commenced a series of pianoforte recitals at St. James's Hall on Tuesday afternoon. His programme opened with the two sets of "Paganini" Variations by Brahms, which offer to a pianist full, indeed over-full, opportunity of showing how swiftly and how deftly his fingers can move up and down the keyboard. And Mr. Lamond passed most creditably through the trying ordeal. As yet he has neither the boldness nor the brilliancy of a Rosenthal; time and practice, however, may work wonders. An interesting feature of the performance was the serious and satisfactory attempt to render the element of virtuosity subservient, so far as is possible, to the sentiment of the music. In his rendering of Beethoven's "Appassionata" Sonata the pianist displayed finished technique, intellect, and feeling: it was classical, and yet not cold. The Allegro was the best of the three movements; in the other two, in spite of many good points, there were weak moments.

LISZT's "Erlkönig" transcription proved a highly respectable failure. The technique was good, but the tone not always pleasant; and the tender melodies were left at times almost entirely to the imagination. This transcription is, I think, one of the most masterly ever written; but technical difficulties must sink into the background if the music is to produce its due effect.

MR. LAMOND was not successful with Chopin's Nocturne in C minor. I think I may say that he was most unsuccessful. The reading was cold, hesitating, at times even hard; the grande passion was altogether lacking. Besides the Nocturne he played the Sonata in B flat minor. I heard only the first movement, and came away under the impression that either the pianist does not possess the secret of interpreting Chopin, or else that on this occasion he was in bad form. It may be the former; the number of players who can read between the notes of the Polish composer's music is infinitely small; the gift must be a natural, not an acquired one.

THE programme included two pieces which ought to be put on the index expurgatorius. Strauss-Tausig's Valse-Caprice, "Man lebt nur einmal," seems to me extremely dull even as a bravura piece. It is just possible that Liszt in one of his exalted moods may have rendered his "Don Juan" Fantasia acceptable; but wonderful as have been some performances of that work—those, for instance, of Rubinstein, Menter, and Rosenthal—I always felt the end come as a welcome relief.

MR. A. SCHULZ-CURTJUS announces a series of five concerts to commence at the Queen's Hall on Tuesday evening, March 16. Herr Felix Mottl will be the conductor, and that, of course, means that the orchestral performances will be good. Beethoven's Choral Symphony is down for the third concert with a select chorus from Leeds, consisting of nearly two hundred voices; the second part of the programme will be devoted to Wagner. Every seat in the hall is pretty sure to be occupied on that evening. At the fourth concert the second part of Act II., and at the fifth the whole of the third Act of "Parsifal," will be given.

THE programme of the first concert bears the superscription, "The Development of the Overture," and actually consists of ten overtures, commencing with Handel's "Agrippina," and concluding with Wagner's "Meistersinger." Programmes dealing with a certain period, or, it may be, composer, are undoubtedly of great value, yet, almost without exception, they are more fitted for the class than for the concert room. With Herr Mottl's "development" scheme per se I have little fault to find, only I fear that so many "openings" may somewhat weary the public. The Overtures not followed by the works to which they belong—Berlioz' "King Lear" and Mendelssohn's "Hebrides" are, of course, exceptions—lose something of their effect; they are to prepare the audience for the drama which comes after, to place them in the right mood. Anyhow, there will be plenty of variety; and seeing that the pill is not gilded, many will swallow it in the right spirit, and accept the programme as one for profit rather than pleasure. J. S. S.

SCIENCE.

THE Institution of Electrical Engineers, which holds its meetings in Great George-street, is, as a body, rather overshadowed by its august parent the "Civil." Nevertheless important papers are not infrequently read at the Thursday sessions of the Institution of Electrical Engineers, and one of them was Sir Henry Mance's inaugural address last week upon the problems of submarine telegraphy. The question at present agitating telegraphists is how to extend the system on which Atlantic cables are worked so as to apply to the long northern stretch of the Pacific. Even on the Atlantic cables signalling is reduced to an average rate of thirty words per minute, owing to the electrification of the inner surface of the dielectric, which retards the action of the current. The longer the line the greater is the capacity of the cable to retain this charge, and on a Pacific cable it is computed that not more than twelve or thirteen words per minute could be transmitted.

So far, all that invention could do in the way of elaboration has been applied to the signalling ends of the cables, Lord Kelvin's instruments in particular having brought the Atlantic rate up from about eight words a minute to the figure mentioned. Another device which has contributed to the same result is a resistance bridge between the cable end and the earth, which acts as a sort of relief valve to the surface charge. This improvement is due to the late Mr. Varley, and is a step in the right direction, but its action only extends a short way, and on a cable reaching from Vancouver to the Sandwich Islands would be practically nugatory. The fact is, as Sir Henry Mance admitted, that in face of this greatly extended distance an entire revolution will have to be made in the form of cable used. At present it is customary to use what is known as a "single-core" cable—one insulated wire wound round with brass and iron armouring—and to employ the earth itself as a return wire completing the circuit. In this way the retardation effect is at any rate only half what it would be if two insulated cables were employed. Various schemes have been proposed as a solution of the question. Mr. Preece, the Government telegraph engineer, advocates a split wire with the halves separated by brown paper inside the usual insulation wrappings and armouring. The notion of brown paper inside a submarine cable betokens a hardy fearlessness, but will not entirely commend itself to an old cable hand; nor, indeed, is it entirely obvious how, without leakage between the wires—which, if it exist at all, may be so great as to produce a short circuit—the difficulty of surface charge is going to be eliminated.

A MORE ingenious and original method of tackling the question was also referred to by Sir Henry Mance, and in terms which sounded distinctly like approval. This is to use two wires, both well insulated and enclosed within the same cable, but here and there to interpose stretches of a three-wire cable, the additional wire being a high-resistance one serving merely as a bridge or "leak" between the two conductors, which are of course continuous. In this way the effect aimed at by Varley could be extended to the whole length of the cable, and the surface charges generated by the passage of the current along the two conductors would neutralise themselves at intervals the frequency of which is only a question of expense in manufacture. The usefulness of a leak in improving the speed of signalling is well known to cable operators, and is occasionally resorted to in moments of emergency; but the objections to a real leak of even the pin-hole character are that it opens the way to corrosion, and eventually means hauling up the cable for repair. An artificial leak, the extent of which can be regulated, and which is entirely enclosed within the protective wrappings, is one that at first sight commends itself, and at any rate deserves a very careful and thorough trial.

THE compliments which from time to time are lavished on the German Government for its generous behaviour towards science seem to have stimulated it to fresh efforts. The latest news is that in this year's estimates for the Kingdom of Prussia a sum of 50,000 marks has been set aside for assisting institutions and private persons to develop the practical usefulness of the Röntgen rays. In this connexion it is interesting to note that M. Bouchard in Comptes Rendus has declared that the fluorescent screen will discriminate between a tuberculous and a non-tuberculous lung; also that the action of the heart can be detected with sufficient plainness to enable diagnosis to be made. The heavy bones and general solidity of the abdominal region make it difficult at present to distinguish between appearances there; but that an improved form of tube or greater concentration of the rays will shortly render this region also permeable anyone can judge for himself by looking at the large full-length Röntgen photograph of a boy in an optician's window near Charing Cross.

THE question of patents has been vexing the souls of many who are dissatisfied with the present system under which inventors are protected. A lengthy letter which recently appeared in a technical contemporary suggested a number of sweeping reforms as a means of getting rid of the abuses which undoubtedly exist. It was proposed, for instance, that an authority should be constituted to examine into and certify the practical usefulness of an invention before a patent should be granted; in other words, that usefulness as well as novelty should be a vital requirement. The writer's apology for this demand is that the public, in awarding a profitable protection to the man who asks for it, is entitled to a quid pro quo in the shape of an assurance that the thing protected is likely to be of public service.

THAT something of this sort might be introduced with advantage is very possibly true. No one who works at the stuffy little library in the Patent Office can avoid the conclusion that much Government stationery and many Government leather-bottomed chairs are wasted on people who will never produce a sensible invention in their lives, and whose hopeless condition might just as well be borne in upon them once for all by a committee of certification. On the other hand, I suppose it is not to be denied that these unfortunates contribute largely to the Exchequer, and, therefore, are likely to be encouraged.

THERE is another view of the matter still, however, which I feel very strongly myself. The inventions that spring, Athene-like, ready made and perfect from the brains of their originators are relatively few. Most of the great inventions of to-day out of which large industries have arisen were built up during a long course of years, in steps, by men whose only hope in experimenting was the fact that their back stages, so to speak, were protected. But for this who would dare to try and work out a complicated idea—the incandescent lamp, for instance—knowing that each partial success could be used by fresh and unscrupulous rivals as a starting-point for their own work? Even as it is the history of many well-known inventions is not untarnished by "jockeying." I could name three or four cases outright in which advantage has been taken of too generous confidence to rush off to the Patent Office and anticipate the real inventor. There is a good deal yet to be said on both sides; but while the experts are clamouring icily for reforms which shall exclude the frivolous, I venture to put in a plea for maintaining the interests of the virtuous inventor.

THE comparison between England and Germany in the matter of skilled industries goes on apace, and has recently called forth a supplementary report signed by some of the members of the old Royal Commission on Technical Education. In this it is shown that as regards certain industries, notably the manufacture of aniline dyes and colour-printing, Germany has made very great strides at the expense of this country, which might, by proper measures taken at the right time, have kept the trade in its own hands. On the other hand, it has been pointed out sensibly enough that Germany is behind us in industrial civilisation. She is only beginning to make up the lee-way caused by the wars of this century, and has the advantage of finding machinery all ready perfected. We had to do the perfecting for ourselves, so that it is no wonder if Germany's increase seems rapid in comparison with our own. Moreover, before we complain, it would be well to note that one secret of Germany's success is the way she adapts her technical education to the requirements of those who ask for it. We spend ever so much more on technical education than does Germany, but we waste half that we spend on a futile attempt to educate everybody—workers and overseers—alike.

BOOK REVIEWS REVIEWED.

Ibsen's "John Gabriel Borkman." (H. Heinemann.) "For undiluted gloom, for unrelieved misery," says the Daily News, John Gabriel Borkman need yield the palm to no other of Ibsen's tragedies. . . . But in all this gloom there is nothing of that overmastering sense of fate, or even of that play of passions on a great scale, which gives its grandeur to antique tragedy and forms its purifying element. . . . What Ibsen shows in his tragedy is the play of poor and paltry vices, and above all the vice of selfishness. "Nor is there anything out of which even those who can see farthest into mill-stones can construct allegories." "Ibsen has returned," says Mr. A. B. Walker in the Chronicle, "to another aspect of a problem which has already haunted him: the impassable gulf fixed between one generation and another. . . . Surely it is the most piteous and poignant tragedy of grey hairs since Lea. . . . And it is 'in the grand style.' . . . To make three such characters . . . and to set these three in a 'fable' so harrowing, so abominably true! What other man than Ibsen could do it?" Erhart, Borkman's son—the bone of contention between his father, mother, and aunt—is in Hamlet's case, but instead of accepting the burden, and being crushed under it, he answers: "I cannot give myself up to this business of yours; I have my own life to live . . . and—in short, Ophelia is waiting for me round the corner—good night!" "A Philistine," in the Westminster Gazette, sees in Erhart Little Eyolf come to life again, and solving the knot after the time-honoured formula: "I must live my life." But for "internal evidence that Dr. Ibsen is devoid of the sense of mirth, I should have concluded at once that this play was a master-stroke of sardonic humour at the expense of the great law of indivisibility" proclaimed in "Little Eyolf." "I am uncertain," he writes, whether Borkman "is to be regarded as a real figure or a piece of 'symbolism.' . . . There is great dramatic force in the sketch of this man." But the playwright "has created an egoistic stage hero (or villain) every bit as conventional after his kind as the more familiar hero or heroine of a common melodrama." The Saturday Review discovers a close analogy with The Pillars of Society. "It is, however, a far more coherent and concentrated example of dramatic construction, and aims at a higher psychology; it is coloured by that symbolism which has become part of the bones and marrow of Ibsen." In general, the play is summed up as "a tragedy of the imaginative spirit concentrated on commercial speculation." "On the character of Borkman, the gigantic swindler, foiled, humiliated, but not wholly cast down, and in the passage of his brain through brooding disappointment to potent insanity, Ibsen has expended his highest efforts." "There are no passages . . . which can be construed into having been introduced for the purpose of exciting controversy by their paradoxical effect." It is "one of the least 'difficult' plays he has ever written."

The Babe B.A.

Being the Uneventful History of a Young Gentleman at Cambridge University.

By E. F. BENSON.

Illustrated. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 6s.

Daily Telegraph.—"Mr. Benson's delightful book is rife with clever definitions as well as graphic character-sketches."

Daily Chronicle.—"There is a rollicking, devil-may-care youthfulness about it which must win upon the gratitude of those who take it up."

Scotsman.—"A bright and humorous picture of University life."

The Maker of Moons.

By ROBERT W. CHAMBERS,

Author of "The Red Republic," "King and a Few Dukes," &c.

Crown 8vo, cloth extra, illustrated, 6s.

Daily Telegraph.—"We cannot for the moment call to mind any latter-day collection of short tales in which vivacious fancy and subtle wit are so happily combined with constructive dexterity and descriptive force.....Everybody should read these delightful stories."

The Historical Development of Modern Europe.

By C. M. ANDREWS,

Associate Professor of History in Bryn Mawr College.

With Map. 2 vols., demy 8vo, cloth, 12s. 6d. each.

Volume I.—EUROPE FROM 1815 TO 1850.

Volume II.—EUROPE FROM 1850 TO THE PRESENT TIME.

Times.—"Mr. Andrews gives to the general public a clear idea of the most important political changes which have taken place in Europe during the present century . . . The author threads his way through the labyrinth with wonderful dexterity, and wisely refrains from entering the numerous by-paths which are encountered at almost every step of the journey. If the narrative is thereby rendered less complete, it gains immensely in clearness."

EUROPE in the MIDDLE AGE. By Oliver J. Thatcher, Ph.D.,

and FERDINAND SCHWILL, Ph.D.
Existing histories of the Middle Age, upon which so much light has been thrown by the researches of recent years, are either general in their outlines or devoted to certain phases of the subject at the expense of others. This work aims at completeness and comprehensiveness, at the same time studying conciseness in detail by a thorough system of classification.

2 vols., 8vo, 36s.

CHARLES PRITCHARD.

*Charles Pritchard: Memoirs of his Life
Compiled by his Daughter, Ada Pritchard.
(Seeley & Co.)*

THOUGH the most active and influential portion of Charles Pritchard's life came to an end more than a quarter of a century ago, his biography will be of interest to many who are still young, so closely did he keep himself in touch with science almost to the end of his career.

When, in 1892, he received (as professor at Oxford and director of its observatory) the Royal Society's gold medal, at the subsequent dinner Prof. Huxley made one of his many happy and humorous speeches: "He was," said he, "told that there was no observatory in the three kingdoms in which so much admirable work of observation was being done. Only a short time ago the Royal Astronomical Society awarded its gold medal to the Director of the Oxford Observatory. He was further told that the director was tackling what he understood was one of the most difficult pieces of astronomical work—parallax determination; and that he had already printed off more stars than anybody else. Besides this, he was hard at work on the great International Chart of the Heavens. It was obvious that this gentleman must be in the full vigour of youthful energy, and therefore he treated with contempt a rumour that had reached him, that the director was in his eighty-fourth year. (Laughter and cheers.) They would join with him in wishing Prof. Pritchard a long continuance of the health and strength which were turned to such splendid account."

The just-published "Life" is a somewhat too disjointed work. Its first chapter is by his niece, Mrs. Ogier Ward; its second is an autobiographical sketch; its third chapter is made up of some pupils' reminis-cences; its fourth (life at Freshwater) is by his daughter, Miss Rosalind Pritchard, and the next three chapters are the work of another daughter, Miss Ada Pritchard. To them succeed some forty pages on his theological work by the Bishop of Worcester, while the book is completed with five chapters (or 100 pages) by Prof. H. H. Turner, F.R.A.S., on his astronomical work.

A tolerably complete account of Pritchard's career can be gathered from these sources, but it may perhaps be regretted that such near relatives have not given a more complete and continuous account of his domestic life.

Born at Brixton on February 28, 1808 (the youngest of four sons and two daughters), he was of Welsh origin on his mother's side (who was a Lloyd), though paternally he was a Salopian. He lost his mother when a lad of twelve, and suffered under the rule of an irritable father soured by pecuniary misfortunes which preceded his departure from Shrewsbury.

A studious and industrious boy, making the utmost of such opportunities as came in his way, his father's want of means compelled him to leave school at sixteen, and thus by a brother's counsel he was left to his own devices to prepare for a University life. When seventeen, a publisher (Piper, of Ipswich) brought out his first work, An Introduction to Arithmetic. Of this work, fifty years later, its author says (p. 34):

"Looking at the little book in the light of the present hour, I feel no shame at the contemplation; even now it is far ahead of most of the arithmetics of the present day, inasmuch as every page of it teems with the attempt to encourage thought. The elementary principles of numbers are explained, and are demonstrated on the simplest principles, and no arithmetical process is presented to the tyro without the detail of the reason thereof. But, alas! these are just the very points that are useless in the modern form of suicidal competition; the reasons of things do not in general pay in the 'competitives.' I remember well how, a few years ago, when I was examining the candidates for certain valuable appointments, I put the rudimentary question as to what numbers are divisible by eight? The fact may seem astounding, but it is true, that out of sixty candidates I did not get the question answered. It was too simple, too practical, too much entering into the reasons and roots of things to have been ever pointed out by the 'teachers' or to have been elicited by the curiosity of the students."

It is interesting to read this protest, made by one so eminently capable and successful in the great art of education, against the modern system of "coaching" and "cramming" for success with examiners who, unhappily, have never been made to go through an examination in examining: a system which too often becomes rather a premium on mediocrity than on depth and thoroughness in knowledge.

By the help of relatives and friends, who lent him money to be repaid—as it soon was, when funds came in—he went to Cambridge as a sizar, selecting St. John's as his College, and going up after Easter, 1826. Having entered so late, he was not expected to be examined in every part of the first year's subjects; yet, as the result of his first college examination, he had the delight of seeing posted up in the College hall: "Pritchard highly distinguished himself in all those parts of the examination which he attended."

His future became at once certain. He had made it clear to the authorities that he might do his college credit, and at each biennial examination he retained the second place. Prizes of books and an accumulation of exhibitions set him at ease about expenses; and when, in 1830, the final trial came, he was Fourth Wrangler. A Fellowship was thus assured, and was attained in 1832, after which he was invited to share in the public tuition of his college. He, however, declined to pursue so inviting a career, and left Cambridge to become a schoolmaster, first at Stockwell and subsequently at Clapham Grammar School, which latter was established in August, 1834. Both of these institutions belonged to a group of new suburban schools which were then being started in connexion with King's College, London.

It was some six or seven years later that, as a small boy, I first made acquaintance with Charles Pritchard—an acquaintance of much importance to me, as was also the case with many of my contemporaries. His first appearance was by no means attractive (as the frontispiece of the volume now noticed may suffice to make easily credible), nor had he an agreeable voice. He was very irritable, and when enraged became terrible to lads of a nervous temperament like his own.

Yet he was really kind and gentle, and I think the boys all felt that in what he did he was governed by a hearty desire for their real good and to do his own duty.

His assertion that in his teaching his object was to make lads think, is one which my recollection strongly confirms. The answer to his question, "What is Euclid?"—an answer, of course, he never had given him—was: "A thing not to be learned by heart." He was never satisfied if lads did not appear to see clearly in their own minds the force of a demonstration. He was exceedingly fond of geometry, and I recollect that on some school feast, ending with a display of fireworks, the climax was not a bouquet of rockets, but a pyrotechnic representation of the figure of the forty-seventh proposition of Euclid's First Book. He could make even arithmetic really attractive, and I shall never forget the interest excited by his exposition of the results of taking 2 or 12 as the radix, instead of 10. It might be expected that a distinguished Fourth Wrangler's teaching of mathematics would be good. But it was much more than that, and excited, in some minds, quite a love for that science.

His teaching of classics was also most painstaking, and accompanied by explanations and illustrations helping to bring home to young minds graphic images of scenes and actions referred to, which lent a charm to the Odyssey and to Homer's Fourth Georgic which time does not obliterate.

The great interest and novelty about Charles Pritchard's system consisted in his having been a precursor, and a very efficient precursor, of those who of late years have advocated teaching physical science to boys. I am not sure that such a practice is generally desirable. It seems to me that a real study of classics and mathematics exclusively, is better calculated than a greater variety of subjects to make the mind a first-rate instrument for dealing with whatever it may have to turn to in later life. Still, I must confess my Clapham Grammar School teaching has been of the greatest service to me, and for that, as well as for other things, I shall, while life lasts, look back with affectionate gratitude to the influence of Charles Pritchard. He taught us something of chemistry, mechanics, electricity, and optics, and erected a well-furnished laboratory and afterwards an observatory, and though it may be true that we may have had imparted to us the fruits of knowledge without all the drudgery which some think to be a necessary preliminary for their acquisition, yet hardly otherwise, in those days, would it have been possible to communicate to youths a love for physical science and desire to really understand it.

But Pritchard's greatest innovation was the teaching of botany, not by books and diagrams alone, but by the careful examination of freshly-culled specimens.

One of the delights of those school-days was our rambles about the "Battersea Fields" (now for the most part an unsavoury wilderness of brick and mortar) to search for wild flowers, with the prospects of a general half-holiday as soon as six boys could bring home specimens belonging to twelve natural orders and point out their distinctive characters.

One very important matter with respect to the teaching of these natural sciences was that he always taught them himself. They were thus well taught, for he loved them, and they also gained a greater esteem in the eyes of the boys because taught by "Old Pritchard" himself.

And it was not only our brains he cared for. Very soon a gymnasium with skilled teachers and a swimming bath were added to the school, cricket and hockey were strongly favoured by him, and football, which then, however, had not its modern popularity so far as remembrance serves.

Whoever reads through the life just published will see how earnest and religious a man Charles Pritchard always was. It will then naturally be supposed he was careful as to the moral and religious training of the lads, and such was most certainly the case. He was a clergyman of rather Low Church views and with nothing ascetic about him; but he was extremely earnest, and some years later built a chapel for the school which seems in every way to have answered the expectations of its founder and zealous builder, and to have served as a model to the neighbourhood. But of course, masters, after all, can have but an imperfect knowledge of the real results of their best-intended efforts. Before the chapel existed, the school attended a very unadorned church, where the senior lads duly took the Sacrament at stated periods. The evening before they had to walk from school to Mr. Pritchard's somewhat distant house, there to be very earnestly addressed and to join in prayer, preparatory to next day's Communion. The good master little suspected the flirtations whereof those nocturnal devotions were sometimes the occasion. Nevertheless, as a rule, a sense of honour and being trusted was a generally sufficient guarantee for good conduct out of bounds.

Of nothing was our master so intolerant as of any breach of morality, concerning which his notions were rigid. The most severe flogging the school ever witnessed in my time was when a lad had been convicted of some rather profane swearing. Another case was when a boy, who had an exceptional facility for extracting cube roots, was found to have taken money in payment for extracting those which a lad had been set to do as a punishment. Charles Pritchard, to the end of his life, was an advocate for corporal chastisement. He was irritable (as before said), and sometimes his anger was excessive. But the lads respected him, and many were sincerely attached to him, as was shown on July 5, 1886, when, in response to our invitation, he dined with us at the Albion Tavern, Aldersgate-street. He was the guest of nearly a hundred "Old Boys," while 113 more expressed their warm sympathy with an act in which circumstances did not allow them to take part.

At that dinner Dean Bradley presided. The old "Roll Call" was re-enacted, and each "Old Boy," as his name was pronounced, cried "Here, Sir," and raised his right hand. Then the set of grizzly-bearded, grey, or bald-headed "boys" separated, never in this life to meet again.

Mr. Pritchard married early a beautiful young lady, Miss Emily Newton, mother of the boy we knew as "Charley Pritchard"; now Sir Charles Pritchard, K.C.I.E., C.S.I. She hardly attained middle-age, and was deeply mourned by her husband, who remained a widower for several years. In 1859 he married again, and in 1862 resigned his school to other hands, and went to live at Freshwater, in the Isle of Wight, till 1870.

There he took the keenest delight in his garden, and zealously studied astronomy, having become Secretary to the Astronomical Society the year before he left Clapham.

On one of his visits to London (in 1868) he was a guest, with Tennyson, of Mr. James Knowles, and then the thought occurred of forming a society for formal discussion, which led to the foundation of the Metaphysical Society. Relieved from scholastic cares, the essential kindness of his nature was clearly apparent. His daughter, Rosalind, tells us:

"We children always looked forward to the return from London. We were never forgotten. The remembrance sometimes took the form of some new mechanical toy, or small trinket, but sweetmeats were more usual. Astonished, indeed, would those only acquainted with the graver side of his character have been, could they have witnessed the performances which marked the bestowal of these dainties. Competitions of the most varied nature, but always grotesque or fantastic, marked the occasion, and I have seen tears of mirth roll down my father's cheeks as he awarded the prizes to the eager little competitors. When he gave himself up to our amusement, no better playfellow was to be found."

In 1870 he was elected Savilian Professor, and therefore left the Isle of Wight for Oxford, where he resided till his death, with occasional sojourns abroad. The scientific eminence and the excellent work he did is shown by the Royal Society Medal and Prof. Huxley's speech already noted. His last journey to London was to receive that medal, after which infirmity grew rapidly upon him. He was, however, really ill but for a single week, and on Trinity Sunday, 1893, he passed peacefully away at the age of eighty-five.

Of his theological opinions and work little will here be said. He was, as already remarked, rather Low Church, and Tractarianism and Ritualism were repellent to him. He disliked Pusey and was intolerant of Newman, regarding him as over-subtle and essentially sceptical. Yet, strange to say, he was more or less sympathetic with the present Pope, and writing to Father Denza, of the Vatican Observatory, he enclosed a copy of the negative of the Pleiades and photographic proofs of the chart of the heavens, saying:

"It would be for me a real pleasure, and more than a pleasure, if his Holiness the Pope would deign to bestow a glance upon this wonderful achievement of modern astronomy. . . . It might serve to divert the mind of the Venerable Pontiff, even if only a few moments, from his multitudinous cares. And if that personage of great heart and goodness should be pleased to send his good wishes to our Observatory, they would certainly be welcomed with gratitude."

The Pope's secretary replied:

"Vatican, Rome: March, 1892.

"I am pleased to announce, honoured Sir, that conformably with your desire Father Denza has presented your fine work on the Pleiades to the Holy Father Leo XIII. He has admired and studied it with great satisfaction and delight. At the same time he heard with great pleasure of the feelings that you entertain towards his person, and of the praiseworthy desire that you show to help Rome from Oxford. Whilst his Holiness returns your feelings with a sense of sincere goodwill and merited esteem, he hopes from his heart that the Observatory of Oxford may continue to be useful, as it has been hitherto, to the progress of astronomical science, especially under your intelligent care.

"In manifesting to you these feelings and wishes of the Holy Father, I embrace, with pleasure, the opportunity of signifying to you my own most distinguished esteem."

To be thus praised both by the Pope and Prof. Huxley is certainly a very exceptional distinction.

With the sincere love for science and deep personal piety which characterised him, Charles Pritchard was naturally much moved by the controversies which arose respecting the views of Bishop Colenso and Charles Darwin. The Bishop of Worcester tells us that his attitude "was anything but sympathetic" towards the "Higher Criticism"—a circumstance surely to be expected in a man of his age and antecedents. He was also a strong opponent of Darwinism, but he was none the less disposed to acquiesce in evolution.

He was a loyal man of science, and could no more endure pious anti-scientific narrowness and prejudice than its opposite. When an astronomical error as to the sun's distance from the earth had been recently detected, and a certain journal was singing "Jubilate" over it, he at once wrote, asking Sir John Herschel to say a word and do away with such nonsense, adding, "I have measured the thickness of one of my hairs, and find that the correction now made in the angle means one hair at a distance of 125 feet."

Charles Pritchard was an honest man whom it was good to know, and from whom it was good to learn. I am very thankful to have been able to give my humble testimony concerning that which I know of him as he lived.

ST. GEORGE MIVART.

PASCAL.

Les Pensées de Pascal: Texte Critique, etc.
Par G. Michaud. (Fribourg: à la Librairie de l'Université; London: Williams & Norgate.)

PASCAL, says Sainte-Beuve, "is at the heart of Christianity itself": Pascal, says Hume, is a Christian Diogenes, the great example of artificial life. Assuredly, he is nothing by halves, be it worldling or convert, sceptic or believer, physicist or Jansenist. Pascal "the stern and sick," as Goethe calls him, was not made for golden mediocrities, but for passions and ardours in their fullest vehemence. His sister and biographer notes well his humeur bouillante. Of most men in notable extremes it is commonly not hard to give an exact account, but Pascal must always abide in a twilight. For though Port-Royal be intimately known to us through countless sources, and though portions of Pascal's life be plain enough, yet the work, from which we try to fashion the true image of his soul, remains a thing of shreds and patches. Our especial gratitude is due to M. Michaud for letting us see to how great a degree that is the case. Other editors of the Pensées, such as Havet, Faugère, and Molinier, have given us those wonderful, strange thoughts, arranged upon some plan of their own, which may, but also may not, be that of Pascal. But this is conjecture; we want the disjecta membra set before us as Pascal left them. At last we have them. The sixth fasciculus of the Collectanea Friburgensia gives us—

"Les Pensées de Pascal, disposées suivant l'ordre du cahier autographe: Texte Critique, établi d'après le manuscrit original et les deux copies de la Bibliothèque Nationale, avec les variantes des principales éditions, précédé d'une introduction, d'un tableau chronologique, et de notes bibliographiques."

The scholarship and scholarly thoroughness of M. Michaud are admirable; thanks to him, here is Pascal himself, not a Pascal garbled by the theological or other preposessions of his editors: Pascal in his loneliness, agony, ardour, recording the cries of his heart, the subtleties of his brain, with painful haste and zeal, sometimes with an incoherence not wholly sane. St. Augustine and Rousseau leave us their Confessions in perfect form: the passion is in orderly display. But Pascal's thoughts are like snatches of sudden prayer, like a dream's broken talk, like Hamlet's soliloquies, interspersed with wide passages of methodical reasoning.

His scientific glory crowned him upon the summit of the Puy de Dôme, the scene of his experiments in atmospheric pressure: fame was there, pride and ambition, in the free, exhilarating air. But when he wrote the Pensées he saw ever beside him a deep pit opening its unfathomed glooms and fears. An hallucination, doubtless, bred of his miraculous escape, as he held it to be, from the accident at the Pont de Neuilly; but the delusion had its intensity of true meaning. Jansenism, that sombre and harsh way of thought, a would-be Catholic Calvinism or Montanism, warped and darkened the world to his eyes. Yet, Jansenism apart, Pascal was one of those Christians who have no possibility of being happy, except through the joy of sorrow and the delight of abnegation. To Théophile Gautier Christianity was odious, as the cause of melancholy, mysticism, and self-denial; because it humiliated the natural man and poisoned pleasure, and induced an infinite longing. Those were its glories and charms for Pascal, who came perilously near to voluptuousness in the rapture of self-torture, the ecstasies of asceticism. One Good Friday, Dr. Johnson, not to be interrupted in his devotions by Boswell, gave him the Pensées. That dear and ridiculous gentleman found in them "a truly divine unction." But unction is not the word; Fénelon, Francis of Sales, have unction; Pascal has a prostrate self-abasement magnificently complete, in which "imbecile nature" is bidden to keep silence, and "impotent reason" to humble itself. All of which is simple, logical, orthodox Christianity; the necessary attitude of man in the presence of the ultimate mysteries, in the ante-chamber of realities. But Pascal, brooding over his Deus absconditus, cannot conclude with a complacent expression of man's limited faculties, and a few pious words about doing our best with what light we have. He waxes exultant and sonorous, terrible and savage, lyrical and mournful, as he dwells upon the estate of "man the admirable, the pitiable." But never a word of whining pessimism, petulant reproach: only a splendid self-contempt, a scourging of the "hateful I." Nothing, says St. Ambrose, is loftier than humility, which cannot be exalted, being the superior state: and Pascal's self-abjection is his tribute to man's marred greatness and high destiny. The Pensées keep up a perpetual harping upon the greatness and littleness of man, as revealed in their greatness by Christianity. "His very infirmities prove man's greatness: they are the infirmities of a great lord, of a disrowned king." Upon every page we think of Pascal as a baptized Lucretius, whose rolling thunders and swift lightnings come from Sinai and Calvary: he is one of the elect sad souls whose profound severity is heartening.

We cannot judge of what value would have been his "Defence of Christianity," for which most of the Pensées are suggestions and notes; probably, it would have been the supreme masterpiece of French prose, if not of all modern prose, but unconvincing to the unbelieving, and perilous to the faithful. Pyrrhonism, in Pascal's sense a kind of Christian Agnosticism, is a philosophic necessary of life; but Pascal was no metaphysician or theologian, and his reasoned treatise would assuredly have crossed forbidden boundaries. Like his favourite Montaigne, he had no method in the observation of life; his proficiency in mathematics, that precise study, led him to distrust and to deary less narrowly-exacting principles of thought. "Il faut avoir ces trois qualités—pyrrhonien, géomètre, Chrétien soumis." There is no heresy in that, but it does not augur well for a work of professed apologetics: Not his reasoning, but his temperament; not his arguments, but his ideas are what enrich the Pensées, making them one of the world's great books. Those to whom the Olympian serenity of Goethe, his "classic equability," seems an intolerable imposture, take instinctively to Pascal; he humbles them and exalts, inspires and saddens; his irony scathes, his compassion salves. His "profondeur de tristesse et d'éloquence," to use Villemain's phrase, sends forth doctrines more commanding and more possible than exhortations to live in "the Whole, the Good, the Beautiful": the straitest sect of the Manichees seems more plausible than that. "La maladie est l'état naturel des Chrétiens" is Pascal's teaching; and, really, we have read much of the same sort in the Gospels. It is for insisting upon this side of Christianity that Mr. Cotter Morison, a strenuous anti-Christian, calls Catholicism "more Scriptural" than Protestantism. Not that a Christian life, says Pascal, is "une vie de tristesse"; because Christian sorrow is more delightful than all worldly joy. Pascal, author of the Provincial Letters, was no dusky, dreary penitent, soured and selfish; he had been an accomplished man of this world, and he became an accomplished man of the next, whose "conversation in heaven" had its gracious dignities. "Oh, what a noble mind is here o'erthrown!" has been quoted of Pascal. "Society" in Jerusalem may have said the same of Paul after that deplorable delusion upon the way to Damascus. Passion, indeed, is the note of the Pensées, an intense, devouring energy of soul and spirit; but there is no sign of any mental degradation. His bodily pains were not those of the crazed fanatic; his style is still trenchant and pure: even what seem to be lapses from perfect sanity may very well be but the hasty phrases of a man in pain, jotting down rough notes, single words, mere indications of a meaning intelligible to himself. The world has not forgiven its deserter. What the world would pardon in an illiterate friar it does not pardon in Pascal the scientific and polite. With Bayle, it calls him a "paradox of the human race." Volumes have been written to prove that he was, and was not, Catholic, Protestant, sceptic, believer: his brain and his MSS. have been examined and forced to yield evidence. Verily, it is dangerous to be a very passionate Christian, trampling on the world's pride—with a greater. "Mediocrity alone is good!" says Pascal in his contempt.

"The heart has its reasons unknown to reason" is one of his familiar, famous sayings; his finer Pensées are of that intimate kind. True, he argues much, even to the verge of naked cynicism, about the "chances" of religion being true—the celebrated argument of the wager. But he speaks far more of Christianity as in itself desirable and delightful, as ennobling and dignifying its receiver. We fight inch by inch against conviction if told that a friend has played us false; but we have an immediate longing to believe the truth of some honourable report. Pascal falls in Platonic love—to use the term correctly for once—with Christianity; he cannot do otherwise. "Who can withhold credence and adoration from so divine a light?" And it was for the honour, as he held, of Christianity in its pure grandeur that he fought his jealous fight with the Jesuit casuistry and for the Jansenist heresy, and became more casuistical than any Jesuit in the process. He was untainted by the sometimes worldly motives which were mixed with the acts of Port-Royal; his pride and scorn and stubbornness were for the sake of a Christianity about, as he thought, to be watered down and made cheap and given over to "the crowd, incapable of perfectness." He lacked that mark of the saints—pitilessness for himself, but boundless charity for others; his Puritanism was averse from all softness and indulgence towards the world in little things, that it might be won to the greater things. In that he was absolutely outside the whole tradition of the historical Church, and allied with a goodly number of heretics, perfectionists of many kinds, who have sought to lay burdens not to be borne by the multitude. He professes a full and firm obedience to the divine authority of Rome; and yet, "If my Letters are condemned in Rome, still what I condemn in my Letters is condemned in heaven!" It smacks of Lucifer and Luther; there is some "hateful I" about that. The fervent passion of the man, jealous for the cause he believes divine, drives him into inconsistency; he was not, indeed, a Lamennais, but much of a Savonarola or a Sarpi, in fighting for his convictions against his superiors. Reasons of the heart account for the worst in him, as for the best: he would hardly have been pleased to learn that Gibbon read the Provincial Letters once a year as a model of theological argument. Not the controversies of his day, but his thoughts on eternal things preserve his glory. Like Wordsworth, but with a more personal and fiery passion, he contemplates the tragedy of life, its "fierce confederate storm" of sorrows, its heights and deeps; turning the light of a restless imagination upon the secular scene, and noting the poignancies of the play. He has made his "renunciation totale et douce" but the burning renunciant sends his thoughts far over the world and its history, appraising the value of things, letting escape him no trace of man's degradation or man's grandeur, eager to show what Christianity can do for both. A lover of superiorities, he has pity for their opposites, but mere contempt for the meagre and the middling; he is capable of making submission to evil, but not a compromise, and, if the heights of sanctity be unattainable, he will still attempt them. France has no writer, certainly no lay writer, who resembles him in his superb austerity: "on mourra seul," he said, and in truth he both was and is a man of isolation, dwelling apart. "Pensée fait la grandeur de l'homme": profoundly, absolutely, is that true of Pascal. He is no phrasemonger—witty, light, clever; "an epigrammatist—a bad man" is one of his rough jottings. Nor is he the elegant and querulous keeper of a sentimental journal. He is one of the voices which at rare intervals come from the heart of a man, and go to the hearts of men: cor ad cor loquitur, and deep answers deep.

"A WISE AND GOOD BOOK."

Rich and Poor. By Mrs. Bernard Bosanquet. (Macmillans.)

MRS. BOSANQUET is one of those who have learnt the secret of the higher philanthropy. She realises that to help one's neighbours effectively requires not only a good heart, but a clear head, and that a scientific study of the facts and causes of poverty is the needed preliminary to any effort after its amelioration. For poverty upon the London scale becomes really a complex and baffling problem. In the village, like many other things, it is simple enough. There is plenty of money, and no person of ordinary enlightenment who knows the people need have much difficulty in distributing it to good purpose. But when it is a matter of dealing with the obscure and isolated millions of a huge city, then uninstructed benevolence is soon in perplexity whether any particular form of charity suggested to it will not, on the whole, do more harm than good. Merely to give is like thrusting an iron rod into some complicated piece of machinery; only the expert can tell what the result will be. Here, as elsewhere, the first need is "light, more light." Mrs. Bosanquet, then, writes as an expert for non-experts. The first part of her volume is a careful study—stimulated, one supposes, by Mr. Charles Booth's Life and Labour of the London People—of the actual conditions of a single typical London parish; of its industries and institutions, of the working of church and school in it, of the habits and opinions of its people, of their real needs and their effective standard of comfort. In the second part Mrs. Bosanquet makes some practical suggestions as to how charitably disposed persons, under the existing social and legal conditions, may at least be sure of not doing much harm. Questions of possible legislative reform do not come within her scheme.

The general impression which we carry away from this singularly instructive and illuminating book is one not so much of the ignorance and ineffectiveness of the poor, as of the ignorance and ineffectiveness of the rich. It is less money that is lacking for purposes of charity, in Mrs. Bosanquet's view, than brains. So much is given to the wrong people, at the wrong time, and in the wrong way.

"Money is flung in among us much as nuts are flung to boys to scramble for. Soup-kitchens, philanthropic societies, country holiday funds, Ragged School funds, funds from all the enterprising newspapers, and funds from all the political clubs in the districts; church funds and chapel funds, missions and mothers' meetings, all are engaged in pouring money into a slough of poverty, which swallows it up and leaves no trace of improvement. No one is the richer for all the thousands of pounds squandered in the parish, for it is given away in miserable little 'doles' which are incapable of helping any man to solid ground, and only help to 'keep him down.'"

The worst of these doles are those due to the pious benefactors of the past. They amount to an enormous sum.

"Let those who are interested in the question of old age pensions realise the fact that there is in England a sum of £1,025,000 per annum actually in their hands and available for the purpose, which is now to a large extent being frittered away in meaningless doles of bread and clothing and half-crowns, which serve no purpose but to create greedy expectations and discontent."

Of the spirit in which modern charity is too often administered, Mrs. Bosanquet says:

"I once showed an old lady, much given to good works of the Lady Bountiful order, how some protégés of hers who were constantly on the verge of starvation might be placed in possession of a small but regular and sufficient income. 'My dear,' she said, 'I don't think it is a good plan; they would get too independent. I like them to come to me when they are in difficulties, and ask for what they want.'"

And so we have a strongly unfavourable judgment from a thoroughly well-equipped observer as to the total effect of four-fifths of the benevolent agencies of the day. Enough, surely, to confirm the belief—which one always runs the danger of being treated as a cynic for expressing—that much of the evil in the world is due to the good heart. Doubtless Mrs. Bosanquet's book will have no immunity from criticisms. It will be said: "These are the rigid views of charity notoriously held by the Charity Organisation Society; and the obviously humane thing is none the less to relieve misery where it exists, without troubling too much about the possible after results." Or, as Mr. Kipling's Badalia Herodsfoot puts it, "You can't pauperise them as 'asn't things to begin with. They're bloomin' well pauped." Mrs. Bosanquet's sympathy with the Charity Organisation Society may be admitted. It may also be justified, on the ground that though the methods of the Charity Organisation Society may occasionally allow a deserving case to slip through the mesh, they do, at any rate, keep up a barrier between charity and the undeserving. Mrs. Bosanquet does not, nor do we, accept the standpoint of

"the commonplace Guardian . . . who will explain his 'policy' by saying that he would rather help ninety-nine impostors than neglect one deserving case; oblivious alike of all wider issues involved in helping impostors, and of the obvious fact that the proper course is to do neither the one nor the other."

And we are not sure that the really humane doctrine, hard though it may appear at first sight, is not Mrs. Bosanquet's, when she says: "It is often urged, 'We cannot let the family suffer for the father's faults.' It is not quite clear to me that we cannot, if that is the shortest way to redemption for all alike." It must not, however, be supposed that Mrs. Bosanquet is a pessimist about her London. She is rather what we should call a meliorist; sceptical, indeed, about many vaunted panaceas and short cuts to social salvation, but yet with a warm hope in the heart of her.

"On the covers of a popular tract," she says, "... I find the quotation, 'Hell is a city much like London.' If this were so, I would cheerfully accept a sentence which should doom me to hell, and would play my part as a citizen to the best of my power; for it would be a city full of pathos and humour, where much that is bad is mingled with all that is lovable; where the very fiends who are represented as tormenting the lost are really engaged in works of mercy and brotherly love; a city, above all, where justice and straightforwardness and manly effort never fail to make their influences felt."

Of Mrs. Bosanquet's practical suggestions we have left ourselves little room to speak. They seem to come to this, "Work through local institutions: become guardians and Board school managers, and strengthen the hands of the Charity Organisation Society." We gather from some of her criticisms that she would add: "Keep your religion and your charity distinct"; and certainly it is no rosy view that she sets before us of the part played by the Churches in the attempt to solve the problem of poverty.

"For many years almsgiving has been regarded by the Church as a mere accessory to religion, and too often as a means of promoting attendance at its services and classes. Now time has worked out its revenge, and the people have come to regard services and classes—and, indeed, religion itself so far as they know it—as accessory to alms-giving and as a means of obtaining relief. It would sometimes seem as if the only hope for both lay in an entire divorce between the two."

Not only is this a wise and good book: it is an exceedingly well-written and even an entertaining one. Mrs. Bosanquet has a keen insight into character, and a gift of lucid exposition. She grasps her points firmly and drives them well home. She has the saving grace of humour. Only inordinate quotation could fairly appraise her practical hints and flashes of shrewd observation. It is a book to enlighten both heart and eyes, and to dust away many of the secular cobwebs of charitable commonplace.

EARLY CHRISTIAN LITERATURE.

Newly Discovered Early Christian Literature in Translations. Ante-Nicene Christian Library: Additional Volume, containing Early Christian Works discovered since the Completion of the Series, and Selections from the Commentaries of Origen. Edited by Allan Menzies, D.D. (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark.)

MESSES. T. & T. CLARK have made accessible to a wide circle of readers a mass of documents, some of which have been studied with intense interest by theological experts in the hope that they might throw new light on that most momentous of historical problems, the growth of early Christianity. Among these may be mentioned the Gospel and Apocalypse of Peter, the Apology of Aristides, and the Diatessaron of Tatian. But one fails to see why the Didaché has been omitted; for, to judge by the advertisement, it does not appear in any former volume of the series.

At the time of the Reformation patristic literature was studied chiefly with a view to discovering arguments for or against the supremacy of Rome. The leaders of the Oxford Movement asked from it a wider basis for Anglican doctrine and discipline than the New Testament alone could supply. And now that the Apostolic origin of much in the New Testament itself has been denied not only by rationalistic, but by Christian critics, the Early Fathers are being ransacked with still greater zeal for the faintest references to our canonical Scriptures. It does not appear, however, that, so far, any new evidence has fallen with decisive weight on either side of the controversy. Granting all that has been claimed for Tatian's Diatessaron, it belongs at best to the second half of the second century, and, therefore, cannot be quoted in proof of the Johannine authorship of the Fourth Gospel, nor even of its having been written much earlier than 150 A.D. Still less can the so-called Gospel of Peter bear the scaffolding of destructive criticism reared on it by Dr. James Martineau. Before drawing any inference from such a mere fragment we must know when it was written, and that still remains a matter of dispute. Mr. Rutherford tells us that "the date of the work is variously fixed by different scholars; Harnack assigns it to the first quarter of the second century, while Mr. Armitage Robinson and other scholars place it later" (p. 5).

Nothing is more remarkable in New Testament literature than its extreme reticence with regard to the state of souls—especially lost souls—after death and judgment. Even the Apocalypse ascribed to St. John only lifts the veil a very little way. Perhaps the prospect of a reign of saints on earth helped to keep this remoter eventuality out of sight. But as the Millenarian vision faded away, men's imaginations busied themselves more and more with the details of a future life, viewed especially on its darker side. The present volume gives a regular series of Apocalypses due to this morbid tendency. They possess a certain interest as exhibiting a steady evolution of eschatological conceptions in a single direction. We find the terrors of hell more and more diverted from their original moral purpose to subserve the interests of the dominant ecclesiastical order. First comes the Revelation of Peter. According to Mr. Rutherford it "must have been written before the middle of the second century." He justly notes the "Judaic severity of its morality," and its kinship to the Vision of Er at the end of Plato's Republic (p. 146). With the single exception of idolaters, to whose fate only one verse is devoted, the lost souls in this vision are suffering penal torments for offences against morality, among which, as might be expected, breaches of charity and of chastity hold a conspicuous place. Next comes the "Vision of Paul," probably composed about 388 A.D. (p. 149). At that time the great Theodosius, who first gave the world a sample of Spanish intolerance, had long been reigning, and a spirit of persecution was abroad which finds an eloquent spokesman in the pseudo-Paul. The supposed Apostle is conducted through the infernal regions by an angel who shows him numerous categories of men and women punished, generally by burning, for crimes often by no means of the deepest dye. Among others, he observes some "clothed in bright garments, having their eyes blind, placed in a pit," and is told that "they are of the people who did alms, and knew not the Lord God, for which reason they unceasingly pay the proper penalties"—whatever those may be (p. 161). After a time Paul breaks out into lamentations, but is rebuked by the angel, who promises to show him punishments "seven times greater than these." And for whom are such extreme and awful penalties reserved? "They are whoever shall not confess that Christ has come in the flesh, and that the Virgin Mary brought Him forth, and whoever says that the bread and cup of the Eucharist of blessing are not this body and blood of Christ" (p. 162). Others are condemned to eternal frost for denying the resurrection of the flesh. Finally, thanks to Paul's intercession, all obtain a periodical respite of twenty-four hours from their pain, on the day of Christ's resurrection—whether once a week or once a year is not made clear. The Apocalypse of the Virgin, "conjecturally assigned to the ninth century," marks a fresh development. Here it is the Mother of God who visits the damned, and among those who meet her pitying gaze are not only heretics of various shades but quite orthodox Catholics who failed to treat the clergy with proper respect, "not rising up to the presbyter when they entered into the church of God." Their punishment is to sit for ever on burning benches of fire. Others suffer equally for sleeping too late on Sunday morning (p. 171). But the worst torments are reserved for the wives of presbyters who did not honour their husbands, i.e., "who after the death of the presbyter took husbands" (p. 172). The Mother of God implores mercy for Christian sinners, but carefully excludes the unbelieving Jews from her intercession. Her prayer is heard to the extent of granting them a respite on the day of Pentecost, "to glorify the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit" (p. 174).

Nearly half this volume is occupied by extracts from the voluminous commentaries of Origen on John and Matthew. A mere glance at them will suffice to justify the suspicion with which the Church has always regarded this great Father. For instance, he frankly admits that the Gospel narratives are irreconcilable with one another when read as simple records of historical events; and he will not condemn their authors "even if they sometimes dealt freely with things which to the eye of history happened differently, and changed them so as to subserve the mystical aims they had in view," altering for theological purposes both what was said and done on various occasions (p. 383). He was also fully alive to the contradictions between Scripture and science—at least what passed for science in his time. But here the difficulty is more easily got over. Physicians, Origen tells us, do not believe in demoniacal possession. They treat temporary insanity as a bodily disorder, ascribing it to a certain sympathy between the moisture of the brain and the moist light of the moon. But this is a mere coincidence due to the cunning of the impure spirits, who carefully watch the phases of the moon, and regulate their attacks on human beings accordingly in order to bring that luminary into undeserved discredit (p. 478). A modern disciple of Origen might suggest that the demons were counterfeiting all the symptoms of epilepsy or hysteria in order to lay snares for the physiologists of the future.

It remains to congratulate the translators on their skilful performance of an arduous task. Their names are a guarantee for the fidelity of the versions, but these also contain many examples of clear, spirited, and idiomatic English, showing a command of literary expression not always combined with profound linguistic scholarship.

PLAUTI BACCHIDES.

Edited, with Introduction, Commentary, and Critical Notes, by J. M'Cosh, M.A. (Methuen & Co.)

Of the twenty-one plays accepted by Varro as the genuine productions of Plautus we still possess twenty. All of these belong to the class known as "fabulæ palliatæ," that is, plays derived from Greek sources with the scenes laid amid Greek surroundings. For his plots Plautus went to the writers of the "new comedy" or comedy of manners, of which Philemon, Menander, and Diphilus were the ablest exponents; but, whereas the refined wit, which characterises these writers, would scarcely have appealed to a Roman audience in the time of Plautus, he discarded this for what was simply farcical, and by means of broad humour, spirited dialogue, and a remarkable power of calling out all the resources of his native tongue, contrived to catch the popular taste in a way which no Roman writer before or after him ever approached. His aim was to amuse, not to educate or instruct; whatever conducted to this end was suitable for his purpose; serious meaning or depth of feeling would be out of place in a burlesque, and to look for them in the comedies of Plautus is an equally idle task; rapid action, amusing incident, plenty of broad jokes and buffoonery—such were the requirements of the Italian playgoer in the third century B.C., and such Plautus supplied.

That his plots suffered in artistic treatment in this process was only to be expected; but that he succeeded in his object is beyond dispute. So again, it is perhaps beside the mark to inquire whether the tendency of his plays is moral or the reverse. He certainly recognised, though perhaps without attaching any great importance to it, a difference between right and wrong, as is clear from the moral appended to many of his plays—e.g., the "Bacchides":

"Hi senes nisi fuissent nihili iam inde ab adulescentia, Non hodie hoc tantum flagitium facerent canis capitis" (ll. 1209, 10).

Coarseness of language undoubtedly occurs in Plautus, but it is never introduced merely for its own sake, or to pander to the lowest instincts in human nature; his characters are made to speak and act as they would in real life, and a glance at the dramatis persona of any Roman comedy might warn us that among such mixed company we are likely to hear a language somewhat more robust and full-bodied than that which passes current in refined circles.

The truth is, Plautus was most at home with the lower and middle classes, and it is for them he mainly writes. A rough good-humour and cheerful sympathy with all leads him to laugh where more severe moralists would censure; but he was pre-eminently the poet to appeal to a nation longing for the return of mirth and merriment, which the long struggle with Hannibal had well-nigh stifled; and it is not a little significant that the first play of Plautus should have been produced in the memorable year of the Roman victory at the Metaurus, B.C. 207—a year which well might call forth every sentiment of national joy and exultation.

In the "Bacchides," a play which ranks high in the Plautine list, we are introduced to the usual characters of Roman comedy: two silly old men, each with a spendthrift son; a rascally slave, whose cleverness is only surpassed by his old master's folly; a swaggering fire-eating soldier; two blandæ meretrices, twins alike in name and fame; a parasite, who will demean himself to anything for a meal; and a pedagogus—this last being the only one with any real claim to respectability. The subject treated is a favourite one with Plautus; the machinations, namely, of a slave, devoted to his young master, to cheat the latter's father and squander his money in chambering and wantonness. Certain incidents in the play do not conform to the strict canons of modern taste, but, upon the whole, Plautus has exercised remarkable self-restraint. The interest is well sustained, and the dénouement, unedifying as it is, is brought about in such a natural way that we feel ourselves obliged to smile at the ridiculous position in which the two hoary old sinners eventually land themselves.

It is this play which Mr. M'Cosh has given English readers a chance of now reading for the first time in a convenient form, for which service he deserves their thanks. Troublesome duty as he confesses in his preface to have found the task of editing, it is obvious from the results that he has not shirked his work. English scholars had certainly neglected Plautine studies till some few years ago; and, though the numerous editions of single plays now annually pouring from the English press prove that the fascination of embarking on this wide and only half-explored sea of research has at last proved too strong for them, it will be long before we shall have anything to compare with the labours of such as Ritschl, Usising, Brix, or Studemund. The present work, though hardly on a level with the best that English scholarship has produced on Plautus in recent years, yet possesses, apart from its value as the only English edition of the Bacchides, distinct merits of its own. Of these enthusiasm for Plautus is one; but this enthusiasm should not have led Mr. M'Cosh into indiscriminate abuse of Horace, because the latter has ventured to criticise the poets of the old Roman drama. If we may say so, without incurring Horace's fate, we think that Mr. M'Cosh has, from a partial misunderstanding of Horace's criticisms, regarded them as a sweeping condemnation, which is far from being the truth. But, in any case, to abuse Horace is not to help Plautus; and, both being so well able to stand on their own merits, we might have been spared this outburst.

Passing to more useful matter, in the introduction we find the life of Plautus, the views of the ancient world about him, an account of Plautine MSS. and editions, and the inevitable chapter on "Metres and Prosody"; this last strikes us as being needlessly long, and the conclusions therefore in danger of being obscured. The "apparatus criticus" at the foot of the text, enabling the student to balance the evidence in favour of conflicting readings or proposed conjectures, must have been an especially difficult task to fulfil, but it has been conscientiously performed; while the commentary will serve not merely to elucidate this particular play of Plautus but help also to an understanding of all; for the editor has made this a special object by means of minute comparison of words and phrases and a careful examination of Plautine peculiarities.

In conclusion, let us add that the play is printed in delightfully clear type, on good paper, and with generous margins. If an analysis of the plot could oust the page of "corrigenda," which now confronts us at the outset, we should welcome the exchange.

THE ART OF MR. BEARDSLEY.

A Book of Fifty Drawings. By Aubrey Beardsley. (Leonard Smithers.)

THIS book, bound in scarlet and gold, is a relic of the true Yellowness. Here, by simply turning over the pages, the curious are enabled to note the phases which Mr. Beardsley's art has passed through in the four or five years in which he has occupied a place in the public eye; to observe how he has progressed (or otherwise) from Malory treated with reverence to Wagner boisterously slapped on the back; how he has worked under the influence first of Sir Edward Burne-Jones alone, then of Sir Edward Burne-Jones and the Japanese combined; then, shaking off both, has sought inspiration in an artificiality found partly in Pope and partly in Watteau; then, has thought to try his hand in the manner now of Mr. Whistler, now of the Little Masters; and latterly he has laboriously clowned it for the delectation of persons who have no sense of fun. At last one lays aside the book in amazement at the artist's cleverness in adopting and adapting the style of others and his perversity in refusing to be himself for more than a fleeting moment. For an artist who persistently expresses other persons, though he may be interesting, cannot enchain. Mr. Beardsley has so dispersed and frittered away his individuality that he never enchains, although few draughtsmen stimulate curiosity more than he. The fascination of forbidden fruit is over his work; he appeals very cleverly to the idle mind's interest in what is darkly naughty, and what to practical busy people is very silly and superfluous. He is continually saying explicitly the things which wiser men and women take for granted; and that, we may remark, was the secret of the modern Décadents. This criticism does not, however, apply to all of Mr. Beardsley's fifty drawings in the book before us. Now and then, when he is at his best, he has qualities not to be found in any of his contemporaries or exemplars. The previously unpublished drawing of "Ali Baba in the Wood" (on p. 146), for instance, suggests that Mr. Beardsley might make an ideal illustrator of certain tales in the Arabian Nights; for in this picture he catches much of the mystery of the book. The "Ave atque vale" (on p. 151) has a dignity which Mr. Beardsley has led us not to expect in his work. "The Coiffing" (on p. 173), a line drawing, is a piece of masterly composition, and the same may be said of the remarkable design in masses of black and white on p. 120. Another surprise is offered on p. 70, where we find a vignette made for the Morte d'Arthur, which positively has life and movement and open air. "Ah, but the artist that was lost," we are tempted to say, with Mr. Dobson, on looking at this beautiful fragment; but in his Morte d'Arthur days, four years and more ago, Mr. Beardsley was frequently almost debonnaire, and always sincere. He has not often been sincere since. Some of the Malory drawings are exquisite, and we are glad that they fill so large a portion of the book.

MISS SOLDENE'S REMINISCENCES.

My Theatrical and Musical Recollections. By Emily Soldene. (Downey & Co.)

MR. KIPLING has assured us—and it were impious to doubt anything proceeding from such an august authority—that "there are nine and sixty ways of constructing tribal lays." There are, certainly, many methods of putting together theatrical reminiscences. Whatever be the method, however, which is adopted, the book, in order to justify its existence, should be brightly written and readable. Much more than this it may be; it should certainly not be less. Miss Soldene's theatrical and musical reminiscences are, we hasten to add, eminently readable, and possess that gay Bohemian colouring which invariably attracts those who live outside Bohemia; while it serves to arouse pleasant recollections among the elect themselves. Miss Soldene showed her versatility—to say nothing of her catholicity—by making her first prolonged acquaintance with the public at the "Oxford" and at Exeter Hall. At Exeter Hall she sang in the "Elijah" and the "Messiah," in company with Mr. Sims Reeves and Mr. Santley. Mr. Santley endeavoured to assuage her nervousness by the following remark: "Nervous!" said he, "what for? You see that crowd of people in front; well, little as you know, they know less." Possibly Mr. Santley considered that there was "no sich person" as a musical critic. After Exeter Hall came a long engagement at the Oxford (1866-7), and then Miss Soldene obtained an opportunity of showing her special abilities in the comic opera line, and commenced what proved to be a lengthy series of successes (in the "Grand Duchess" and "Chilperic," and "Genevieve de Brabant"), which she won, not only in England, but in America, Australia and New Zealand. Miss Soldene's sparkling exuberance and overflowing animal spirits seem scarcely to have ever deserted her—except on sea voyages. In fact, there is something Pickwickian in the rosy coloured picture of her doings, although we fear that many of the incidental touches would have deeply shocked that proper old gentleman in gaiters.

Some of the stories are amusing enough in their way, though the humour is of a decidedly broad character; and these scarcely bear translating from the free and easy atmosphere of Bohemia into the more conventional atmosphere of the region outside. So we may confidently leave them to receive their proper meed of praise when the Eminent Person and the Mere Boy discuss them in the smoking-room. Miss Soldene briefly alludes to the ill-success of "H.M.S. Pinafore" when first performed at the Opera Comique in 1878; but we do not know why she invariably spells Mr. D'Oyly Carte's name as "D'Oyley." At times, we must confess, Miss Soldene's gossip rather palled upon us. It is impossible to feel more than a faint interest in the fact that Mr. A— entertained a great partiality for pretty girls (a characteristic by no means confined to Mr. A—); or that Lord B— would occasionally have tea, more occasionally something stronger, with a few chorus ladies; and even the remark that Lord Rosebery once appeared behind the scenes at the Gaiety only mildly thrilled us. Still, although this volume is not brilliantly entertaining, yet, like the curate's egg, it is excellent in parts.

ROYAL ACADEMY ARCHITECTURE.

The "Builder" Album of Royal Academy Architecture, 1896. (Catherine Street, Strand.)

To the enterprise of the Builder we owe this spacious volume. On one page is the reproduced drawing of a building; on the other is the explanatory letterpress. Eighty-one plates of buildings, of decorative designs and of sculpture, represent the selection made almost entirely from the walls of the little parlour dedicated to architecture at the Royal Academy. This well-got-up Album forms a pleasant reminiscence of the summer-house which through last year, as through many others, gave rest to the picture-weary and to the lovers of one another. The monochrome tinted wall veilings and the central sofa afford repose to the colour-haunted eyes of note-taking critics, and to the bodies of those who have had a good collation. It is a small heaven where the learned cease from troubling and the Philistines merely rest.

It would seem that designers who have in hand important and realisable work are coming more and more to feel that the pictured paper is either a false or an inadequate representation of the actual walls: thus, we have increases of competition drawings which have been futile, and of designs ordained by fancy and not by clients. The men who are big—in the conventional sense at least—send fewer and fewer of these perspective phantoms of accomplished work. The Academy grows more justified in the niggard lines of the space allotted to the most important art of which it takes official notice. The enthusiastic beginner, the man who only builds with coloured water on Whatman's paper, the firms who deal in decorations, fill the spaces prepared for the past masters who do not come. If the authors of buildings, both good and great, could be induced to send a well-done plan, section and elevation, made to a moderate scale, of each or some of them, there might be a successful architectural room. In the meantime we endeavour to be content with the things of which this album is the outcome. Neither the public, nor the experts, nor those neuters the critics, can be excited by a show which has neither ad captandum, nor technical, nor allusive quality to recommend it. The end, however, is peace; there is nothing to quarrel about; neither the outsider, the expert, nor the critic find a bone to pick; thus the room is rather an asylum for painless extinction than a home for the dogs of war.

In the meantime we have in the Builder Album a record of the state of things that exists. It would seem that the men who foresee that their drawings will be reproduced should use a pen and Indian or common ink; brush-work, especially in colours, does not come out well in process, and loses the lineality and clearness which belongs to pen-work when applied to a subject where form is first. This is an obiter dictum; the drawings themselves, whether in wash or line, have in the reproduction been most carefully treated. The designs have been discussed long since by the professional journals; those which have been carried out have living commentaries every day, those which have not have joined the "lost causes." We are glad that the Builder perseveres with these annual volumes; for even the imperfect history which is thus being formed of our architectural progress teaches us what courage we may gain from hope, what resolution from despair.

POETRY.

MR. ALFRED AUSTIN'S NEW POEMS.

The Conversion of Winckelmann, and Other Poems. By Alfred Austin, Poet Laureate. (Macmillan & Co.)

MR. ALFRED AUSTIN is a modern Apollo, whose Daphne is the Muse, and from whom Peneius, living again in Lord Salisbury, has rescued the flying nymph by transforming her into a laurel:

"And in his triumph the victor confounded, Clasped at a woman and kissed but a bough."

He has the laurel at any rate. He wears it on his title-page, and yet is not content. Through one hundred and fifty pages he chases the vanished Muse with even feet. Mr. Austin is not a writer from whom we expect surprises, nor does he give us any in the course of the new volume, unless it be by the omission of Dr. Jameson's Ride, verses which had at least the merit of catching the spirit of their theme, for the raid succeeded as ill in rhyme as it had done in life. No doubt the contents of the new book are designed to take a range as widely popular and as domestic as befits the lays of a Laureate. All the same, the Conversion of Winckelmann will convert nobody to Mr. Austin who was not converted already. As a poet he stands where he did, as everyone who knows anything knew he would. The Muse may be a wondrous faithful wife; but the espousals must be when the poet is young. We speak, of course, of those writers, few and far between, who contract marriages with the Muse. There are others who merely follow in her train. To these last Mr. Austin belongs; and though we, too, suffer from the shock of seeing some critics rating rhyme as poetry for no other reason than that it appears in print, we refuse to throw, by way of reaction, cheap jibes at a man because he is not in the front ranks of his calling. "Do not shoot the organist—he is doing his best," ought to be an unnecessary monition to an audience of reviewers. That the laurel, seeing who had worn it, should be made prostitute to politics was a grief—we use no lighter word—to the lovers of poetical poetry. But the thing is done; and even if it were shown that Mr. Austin not only accepted the honour, but sought it, we have enough compassion for the kindred weaknesses of human nature to let that, too, pass, and to judge of his book without any prejudice against it for the post he holds.

The Conversion of Winckelmann tells—or rather suggests, for there is no frank history in it—the story of the conversion of a Lutheran German to Catholicism in order to pursue the better his antiquarian studies. Dickens once complained of the unreasonable grounds on which, as an editor, he was asked to accept contributions—because, for instance, the editor once "lent an alpenstock in Switzerland to the writer's wife's nephew, when that interesting stranger had broken his own"; and perhaps only a convert to Roman Catholicism can appreciate the profoundly unreasonable explanations which others offer for his conduct. Unable to appreciate his real motives, they have twenty improbabilities at hand for quotation. That Winckelmann was the victim among his German friends of this natural selection of motives for his change of religion we have no doubt. But the supposition of his insincerity rests on an absolute ignorance of the ethics and habits of the Roman Court at the period, and it has not a phrase, a wink even, of Winckelmann in its support. It is, therefore, an unsatisfactory subject for treatment such as Mr. Austin's, where Winckelmann is made out of his own mouth to utter his own condemnation. If Mr. Austin had a dramatic situation to give, if he felt he could betray in very truth the soul of a man in a false position, well and good; but where was the need to pin these tatters of a moral reputation to the body of Winckelmann? He had not even a name, one imagines, to recommend him to the reader of modern verse. However, whether of Winckelmann or another, no matter now. The story is told by Mr. Austin in blank verse, of which it is no shame to say that it has its constant derivations from Tennyson and Browning, poets whom Mr. Austin, as a critic of old, has not otherwise flattered. The poem opens with a soliloquy by the antiquarian, who thus counts the cost of his lie:

"One sudden, solitary, sterile lie,
With no false brood to follow, haply born
Of feebleness, surprise, forbearing fear
Lest the hard fact should hurt, were base enough;

"Look this colossal lie full in the face!
It is not sudden, solitary, barren,
Feeble, surprised, a gift to tenderness,
But a deliberate, procreative lie,
Teeming with perjured progeny, swarm on swarm
Of profitable falsehood, each fresh fraud
Begetting a new litter: lie on lie,
With lies, and ever yet more lies to follow,
A labyrinth of lying! Winckelmann!"

Mr. Austin can always plainly express himself—he has not graduated as a journalist for nothing. And sometimes the expression has the beauty of the following lines:

"Battoni's lovely daughters, voice with voice,
Like two waves wantoning to be one, awhile
Eluding each the other, near, apart,
Till merged at length in one smooth melody."

At its medium it is this:

"There Hermes, not yet dwarfed to Mercury,
Winged at the head and sandalled at the heel,
Heaven's messenger alert, whose stolen strings, Stretched deftly o'er the sluggish tortoise' shell,
Make instant music: Virgin Artemis,
Kept chaste by action and the brisk embrace
Of Morning, bright and chilly as her spear,
Her bare feet diamonded with meadow dew,
And twin-leashed boar-hounds baying at her side, Beating Arcadian covert."

To return to the story, Winckelmann crying out at last:

"There's nothing under heaven I won't believe,
I'd sooner be a priest of Cybele Than bide imbruted here," makes his submission to the shadowy Cardinal, and so attains "the grandeur that was Rome," and unlocks for himself the doors of the Vatican Library, which, you are to suppose, is "enclosure" against non-believers. In the Villa Albani the second section of the poem finds him the prey of scruples; and in the third section his lying on a couch at Trieste, after he had been mortally wounded under circumstances that are well known. A Capuchin friar is at hand, and an old Bible—which you are supposed "the Cardinal" would not approve—is of course an accessory of this last scene. "You are very kind," he says to the Capuchin,

"And so is the Madonna, and" [so is, sic,] "the saints,
But if you'll read to me from out the book
My mother gave me when I was a boy,
In the old Mark, I think I should prefer it."

The poor "preference" notwithstanding, the Capuchin ends the poem by declaring:

"The homing soul goes quiet on the wing Unto its nest in heaven."

Mr. Austin is said to be most at home in the garden, no doubt truly; he is a garden poet; but it is just there that the reader of poetry, too, is most besieged by memories of the exquisite imagery which flowers have afforded to the bards, and is, in consequence, most exacting. Such poems as "Another Spring Carol," with its "cowslip tapers," recalling Mr. de Vere, and its pretty though not new-born—

"And the sod is uplifted
By crocus spears;

and "A Florilegium" show us Mr. Austin as we can read him best:

"All the seasons of the year
Have flowers for you, dear.
When the ploughland's flecked with snow,
And the blue-eyed scyllas blow,
Gazing, through the wintry gale,
Like your eyes when you are pale;
When in many a cloistered walk
Droop upon their modest stalk
Vestal snowdrops, one by one,
White as is a wimpled nun;

These and more, to you I bring,
Bold outriders of the spring."

The verses on "John Everett Millais" are surely unworthy of publication by a serious writer addressing serious readers; and the curious determination to sit up to Tennyson in Tennyson's chair is strangely shown by Mr. Austin in his "Who would not die for England?" and "The Point of Honour." Why, we could have dispensed with Alfred the Greater himself in the moods that produced "The Grandmother," and some of his addresses to Royalty. Then, Mr. Austin, failing recognition of his boundaries, which in poetry is as great a transgression as in the law of the land is the failure to recognise your neighbour's land-marks, insists on being philosophical, and tries A Reply to a Pessimist, not of course without some well-turned stanzas:

"Is Love less sweet because men loved of yore?
No, sweeter, stronger, with the ages' growth.
Love's long descent ennobles loving more,
And Helen's falsehood fortifies one's troth."

Bridging Time's stream with its commanding span,
We stand upon the Present, and we scan Future and Past, and seem to live along them both."

"Love's long descent ennobles loving more" is the striking and memorable line of the volume; but Mr. Austin made havoc of his own good fortune by going on to the banal end. He proceeds to admonish us:

"Yet fear not lest that knowledge should deflower

The awe that veils the inviolable Power, Or that we e'er shall learn what, whence, and why we are—"

which is a concession to the pessimist as tremendous as the pessimist could have desired.

By loose language and a failure of grasp, Mr. Austin gives the optimistic case away again and again:

"What if there were no Heaven? there is the Earth.

What if there were no goal? there is the race."

In fact, the happiness of life is in seeking happiness, even though there be no happiness to seek. If these are Mr. Austin's metaphysics, we prefer his metres.

Under Quicken Boughs. By Nora Hopper. (John Lane.)

THE Celtic movement in literature is an accomplished fact, and it would ill beseem, therefore, even a brutal Saxon, with the English respect for facts, to sneer at it. In truth, there is no occasion to sneer at it. It has produced much good literature, at the head of which is the work of Mrs. Hinkson and of Mr. W. B. Yeats. Miss Hopper's Under Quicken Boughs, too, is permeated with the characteristics of the school in poetry. Mrs. Hinkson has evidently been studied by Miss Hopper; but, for all that, the younger poet's note is in a manner her own; and those who are fascinated by this endeavour to infuse new blood into English literature will give to Miss Nora Hopper's poems a favourite place on their shelves. We take Miss Hopper at her average in our quotation:

IRISH IVY.

"Ivy of Ireland in my garden grows
Beside the foxglove that the wild bee knows,
More dear to me than lavender or rose.

"Grey moths about me flit, and gold wasps hum:

The bees salute it softly as they come:
The east wind loiters by it, and is dumb—

"Or whispers very lightly of green rings,
The hollow raths, the fairy-people springs,
And buried days when Boholaun had wings,

"And rode amid the unforgotten Shee.
Or the west wind comes, laughing from the sea,
And tells the youngest leaves of days to be,

"When Eri's grievous wound is healed, and she Shall lift her gracious head, and, smiling, see Her children coming crowned about her knee.

"Ivy of Ireland, is the promise clear?
You climb towards the light 'twixt hope and fear.
But would to God the day we wait were here!"

FICTION.

Animal Episodes and Studies in Sensation.
By G. H. Powell. (George Redway.)

IT is an adroit title. The word "studies" conveys a gentle suggestion as of one who has stepped down from a higher plane to inquire into the sensational "in a spirit of truth." Mr. Powell would have us know that his mind is philosophic though his pen may dabble in gore. He may be reassured. No one who dips into the Studies in Sensation and has the eye for a "style" can doubt that the author will be quite as effective in low tones as he is with the primary hues of the tragic and the supernatural. Indeed, the first story—of Mops the Terrier and his interference in the Irish question—is so studiously placid as to convince one of Mr. Powell's intention in assigning its position. The debased reader, however, who desires to feel his flesh creep should omit the opening story and get at once into the thick of Mr. Powell's "sensations." He will read of people in fearful peril on burning roofs, who escape by cutting down telephone posts and walking along them to the next block; of dire combats between men and eagles, cats and deadly snakes; of runaway horses that career down streets "up" for mending; of Lucrezia Borgia poisons picked up in old bookstalls; of thrilling adventures in the Alps; of scaly monsters, haunted houses, and mysterious moats. Clearly Mr. Powell has "studied" sensation to some purpose. It may be granted that some of his excursions into the awful are quite models of their kind, their kind being the short magazine story. It is worth someone's while to look rather closely into the influence which the rise and progress of monthly magazines has had on fiction. Such tales as Mr. Powell's did not exist fifty years ago, when ideas, if not fewer, were more rigidly economised. The strange case of Sharon Fulksey would then have occupied as many pages as it does lines; and nothing less than the regulation three volumes could have done justice to "The Reresby Mote Ghost." One could almost wish that Mr. Powell himself had been a little more generous with details in this story. Nothing is easier than to mystify by omitting to supply explanations; and the Reresby Ghost is too much of a cryptogram to suit the taste of an experienced student of the ghosts of fiction. It recalls Mrs. Carlyle's saying about "Sordello," for at the end one is still uncertain whether the ghost is a shark, or a crocodile, or a man in armour. It rings bells, which seems inconsistent with aquatic habits. On the other hand, it devours swimming dogs and ungrateful secretaries, to whom ancestors in coats of mail are not as a rule so partial. If Mr. Powell meant the gaps to be filled in by the imagination, we fear he will have many disappointments. If he wilfully withholds the clue, or has not one, that is mere wantonness. The reader finds himself in the position of the Reresby Mote boy who prepared stout fishing tackle with much labour, and dropped it into the water from his bedroom window, but of whose fortunes in the gentle art we hear not another word.

The Babe, B.A. By E. F. Benson. (Putnam's.)

STRICTLY speaking, Mr. Benson's book is not a novel. It is of the family of Verdant Green, but with this difference: that whereas Cuthbert Bede's college joke to cure the dumps kept its savour for several generations of undergraduates, Mr. Benson's pages will in a year or so mystify his readers. To-day it should be relished at Cambridge by third and fourth year men, especially at King's. The Babe is, indeed, a King's book, as all who recognise the original of Mr. Stewart will agree, and King's will laugh over it a little; and here and there, no doubt, a Freshman will model his life on that of Mr. Benson's heroes, so powerful is literature or so plastic are Freshmen. On p. 217 we find a passage which seems to give a clue to the book: "The Babe murmured something inaudible about there being no reason to listen; but, when pressed, confessed that he had been reading the Green Carnation and it had affected his brains." Mr. Benson's style suggests that he also has been reading the Green Carnation, and it had affected his brains. Mr. Stewart talks precisely in the manner of Esmé Amaranth in Mr. R. S. Hichens's squib, though perhaps less humorously, and there is the same atmosphere of gilt-edged paganism. By the Babe himself we are reminded both of Ouida and Dodo: his name and his prowess (he is a Rugby blue, and drinks Chartreuse out of a tea-cup) suggest the manner of the enchantress of the seventies; his speech is the speech of Mr. Benson's first heroine. Thus, if the remarks of Dodo concerning kidneys may still abide in some readers' minds, they will be glad to know that the Babe pursues the fascinating subject:

"Kidneys are not attractive to the eye, but the proof of them is in the eating. I eat them because they are so comfortable, as the Psalmist says. By the way, has Sir John Lubbock put the eating of kidneys among his Pleasures of Life?"

The book hardly calls for serious criticism. It clearly was written in high spirits, with the aim simply to amuse. We have found it amusing here and there, although never to the point of laughter, and the one serious chapter is, we think, quite the best thing.

Mr. Benson, with questionable taste, introduces living persons into the dialogue, and we notice a few inaccuracies—the Babe would not be likely to value Miss Cissie Loftus for her dancing and, Ranjitsinhji should be spelled correctly in a Cambridge book. The photographs of King's College Chapel, the Backs, and other places seem rather out of place, especially as the Babe somewhere says, "Hymns and photographs are so much alike. . . . They are both like Sunday evening."

Marm Liza. By Kate Douglas Wiggin. (Gay & Bird.)

It is a pleasant gift that Mrs. Wiggin has of sympathy with the helpless and the weak, and of engaging for them the interest of her readers. Marm Liza belongs to the class of congenital idiots, though her case is a very mild one. In the hands of Mrs. Grubb, a lecturing faddist, a prophet of all the Anti-'s, she is growing up in body while her mind remains undeveloped. By good luck she and the tempestuous twins, the charge of whom is her daily responsibility, attract the notice of Mistress Mary, a charming young woman, the head of a sort of community devoted to the care of such cases. The story of Liza's mental growth under the intelligent and loving care of these maidens, which culminates in an act of heroism for the salvation of the tempestuous twins, is told with power, taste, and finish. The treatment of Mrs. Grubb is very effective but goodnatured satire, and the story throughout is accompanied by a ripple of quiet laughter.

Le Selvo. By Ouida. (Fisher Unwin.)

ANOTHER variation upon the eternal theme of the Crucified; this time in Italian setting, a setting of gloom almost without relief. It is the picture of a peasantry degraded and insensible; lost to mirth, lost to religion, lost to love; cruel, ignorant, mercenary. Ouida writes of a woodland district, the property of the Gandolpho family, over which was set an Agent "from the North," one who had been cashiered from the Russian army for complicity in a Nihilist intrigue. His predecessors had been thieves and hypocrites, and therefore he, who "wished to make them less poor, but strove to make them more honest," was hated and went about his business in constant expectation of a bullet from behind the next tree. Muriella, the niece of two peasant rogues, alone had some inkling of Cyrille's righteousness, some sympathy with his endeavours. She had learned something of the lady from whom he was divided; and having learned to love him, she forgot to love herself.

"'Holy ones . . . I give you all I have. Grant him his heart's desire.' And she loosened from her throat a little agate heart. It had been her mother's . . . She laid it down under the silver lamp upon the altar; it was her only treasure."

So at the last, when he was making his final stand, alone in the deserted house, against the mob of ruffians which surrounded it, Muriella brought aid, and perished: the sacrifice was accepted. The tale is told with directness and simplicity; for the most part the author holds herself well in hand, and selects the essential with the unfailing instinct of the true craftswoman she undoubtedly is.

Mr. Spinks and his Hounds. By F. M. Lutyens. (Vinton & Co.)

MR. SPINKS is a young man of more wealth than blood or brains, the son of an enriched hairdresser. Being blessed with sporting ambitions, he falls into the hands of some aristocratic blacklegs, and is variously fleeced. Among other things he is induced to become a M.F.H. Much of the interest of the story consists in the ingenious devices by which a dismissed huntsman, whenever a meet takes place, manages to draw the hounds away out of sight of the master and the hunt. Ultimately Mr. Spinks's eyes are opened to the rascality of his mentors, the old huntsman is taken back into favour, and the story ends with a wedding. Mr. Lutyens is not quite as happy as the inimitable and racy author of Sponge's Sporting Tour, Mr. Surtees, whom he makes his model; but we see no reason why this book should not be popular in the smoking-rooms of clubs, and in country-houses, where, we suppose, sporting novels are read.

Irralie's Bushranger. By E. W. Hornung. "The New Vagabond Library." (Neville Beeman.)

MR. HORNUNG always writes well of Australian life, which he knows thoroughly; and bushrangers are his specialty. In this story the question is, whether a certain seedy visitor to a distant sheep-station is in reality a bushranger or, as he gives out, the expected owner of the property; and the mystery is kept up well to the end. The girl Irralie, with her alternate suspicions of and confidence in the stranger, is capably done. But is it not a little improbable that a man who had knocked about most corners of the world would run the risk of being shot, and would leave a girl at the mercy of a desperate villain, merely out of fear of confessing that he had been "stuck up" on the road and of getting laughed at as a "new chum." But for this unreality, the story is exciting and attractive. But we wish that Mr. Hornung would give us less adventure and more of that serious study of character for which he has shown himself abundantly qualified.

Good Luck. By L. T. Meade. (J. Nisbet & Co.)

AT her best, Mrs. Meade can reveal something of the infinite pathos, the triumphant joys of which life is composed; at her worst, she is long-winded, and belabours the commonplace. In Good Luck, one of three recently-published novels by her, there is some strength and much weakness; a great deal that is merely pleasant, little, if anything, that is distinctive. The scene of the story is laid in the East-end of London, and though the author's insight into the joys and sorrows, the strange vicissitudes of the workers' lot is not profound, a happy touch here and there gives a sense of actuality. The figure of old Grannie Reed stands out from those of her companions. For many years she had earned a scant livelihood by fine needlework, chiefly by the wonderful feather-stitch which, as she proudly averred, had been in the family for generations. When trouble came, and her right arm lost its power, the hospital doctor told her she had writer's cramp. "Ef there is a mischievous, awful thing in the world it's hand-writing. I only do it twice a year, and it has finished me, my lad," she says pathetically. As to the plot, it is somewhat slender, and the end is foreseen from the beginning. Greater reticence and a more rigid economy in the use of words would strengthen the book. Phrases such as "Alison's low reply was scarcely discernible" suggest careless revision.

Catalina, Art Student. By L. T. Meade. (W. & R. Chambers.)

If it is impossible to accept the dictum of a well-known critic that love is a delusion, introduced by dramatists and novelists to satisfy the taste of an emotional public, yet a book such as Mrs. Meade's, where love—in its restricted sense—plays no part, is refreshing. The story of the brave little art student is told simply and directly. A child in years, Catalina's swift intuitions, her dauntlessness, her power to act aright in an emergency, made her influence dominant in her father's house, where mother and sisters were of little use. The relationship between the old scholar and the young girl is admirably indicated; and the narrative of Catalina's successful struggles is told with spirit and insight.

A Woman's Cross. By Alice M. Diehl. (Digby, Long & Co.)

THE title of Mrs. Diehl's book is inadequate. It is not a single cross which poor Joan Burney is called upon to bear, but a thousand crosses, each one more terrible than the last, until, finally, the reader can scarcely credit the continued existence of a life so wounded, so mercilessly stricken. In her effort to write an intense narrative the author has defeated her own object. Sunshine is necessary to shadow; intensity ceases to arrest where all is meant to be intense. From the time, early in the book, when the hurricane breaks forth, the reader is borne along on tempestuous waves of emotion; if weariness does not come to his aid, if he follow with interest the hundred and one painful complications of the heroine's career, he is a fit object for pity. The characters themselves seem to be exhausted by the hurry and turmoil of events. Despite a resemblance to other stories of its kind, A Woman's Cross is cleverly conceived, but the author might have been satisfied to omit the Raymond-Douglas tragedy, resulting from "a certain delicacy in the use of their loved one's name," a delicacy in which, by the way, we cannot believe. To those who desire an incessant torrent of emotion, the book can be recommended with confidence.

Philippa. By Mrs. Molesworth. (W. & R. Chambers.)

MRS. MOLESWORTH takes small account of modern phases of thought; the storm and stress born of the fight for freedom, the thirst for new experience, do not come within her scope. In Philippa she concerns herself with an essentially domestic drama whose incidents, to say the least, are not fraught with large significance; indeed, the story turns on nothing more momentous than the heroine's well-intentioned freak to act as maid to her sister, when that sister goes on a first visit to some rich relatives. A thoughtful girl such as Philippa, moreover, would not permit the memory of ten days' sham servitude to become an obsession; the situation is inconsistent, and as the motif of a book almost ridiculous. If she had poisoned her mother, the recollection could hardly have dogged her with greater persistence. No, we cannot believe in Philippa's life being blighted, well-nigh ruined, because, in order to be of use to her sister, she lived in the servants' hall for a brief time. There is much careful work in the volume which might well have been expended on a worthier theme.

A Study of Sex. By Paul Herbert (Lamley & Co.)

THE heroine of Mr. Herbert's story is a young lady "with no settled beliefs," who boldly discusses morality in the presence of men, and extorts a confession from one of her lovers by threatening him with the "physical magnetism" of his rival. A Study of Sex is not a study at all, but a chain of episodes vaguely related, and linked together by a series of feeble and irrelevant dialogues. Mr. Herbert has no idea of the unity and compactness which should distinguish a work of art: his characters work out their fates independently of one another—indeed the only one of substance, the tenor Wieland, after taking up half the book, dies without in any way affecting the ultimate issue.

Alida Craig. By Pauline King. (Elkin Mathews.)

Alida Craig is a healthy and pleasantly written story of a fast-vanishing type. Miss King has put her plot together rather carelessly, and she occasionally anticipates herself; but she makes no attempt to eke out her talent with the would-be clevernesses of the short-story school; her characters are amiable without being angelic, and her style is characterised by a simplicity sometimes rising to distinction. The "girl-bachelor" who gives her name to the volume is a charming creation.

Indian Gup: Untold Stories of the Indian Mutiny. By the Rev. J. R. Baldwin. (Neville Beeman.)

"WHY don't you write a book?" demanded Mr. Baldwin's friends. He has followed their advice, and has set the result afloat under the name of Gup, which is handy Indian for "gossip." Quite pleasant gossip it is, of a strictly correct kind; but with the sub-title before our eyes, it may be well to warn the reader that it has almost nothing to do with the Mutiny. Nor did the writer encounter any danger, unless from rough roads and half-broken horses (the memory of which adventures makes him terribly sorry for himself), and from a small pox epidemic, which he showed considerable presence of mind in eluding. It was not for this that he won the Victoria Cross—in fact, in spite of the heading of chapter vi., Mr. Baldwin is not a V.C. There is always a certain pleasure in reading a book that the author enjoyed writing, and Mr. Baldwin would seem to have enjoyed himself a lot.

FROM CROWDED SHELVES.

The Sense of Beauty: Being the Outlines of Aesthetic Theory. By George Santayana. (A. & C. Black.)

THE scientific study of aesthetics has lagged rather notably behind that of ethics. The reason is probably that whereas ethical theory has, indirectly at least, a not inconsiderable influence upon ethical practice, æsthetic theory has, on the other hand, very little to say to æsthetic production. Inspiration comes most readily to the artist in other ways than that of speculation upon the essential nature of beauty. Prof. Santayana's book, which is based upon a course of lectures delivered at Harvard College, is therefore a welcome addition to a scanty literature. He describes it as an "attempt to put together the scattered commonplaces of criticism into a system, under the inspiration of a naturalistic psychology." Prof. Santayana might, we think, be called upon at the outset to meet many metaphysical difficulties. A doubt might be raised whether the conception of "æsthetic value" is consistent with a naturalistic psychology at all, whether it is not rather one of the points from which an assault on naturalistic psychologies must take its start: and we are certainly unwilling to accept without protest the tendency shown throughout this book to treat the sensations or judgments of beauty as merely concomitants of more naturalistically explicable states of consciousness. But, granting Prof. Santayana his metaphysics, we fully recognise the value and acuteness of his analysis of the various elements of which our conception of the beautiful is made up. These he distributes under the three heads of "Materials of Beauty," "Form," and "Expression," and on each he has some penetrating and instructive criticism to offer. He stimulates us even where he does not convince.

Collectanea: Third Series. Edited by Prof. Montagu Burrows. (Oxford Historical Society.)

AMONG all our learned academies there is none more meritorious, either for the essential interest of its publications or for the scholarly care and accuracy with which they are put before the world, than the Oxford Historical Society. To it we owe Prof. Fowler's History of Corpus, Mr. Andrew Clark's Register of the University, and the same editor's admirable reprints of Anthony Wood's Life and Times and History of Oxford. May we breathe a hope that Mr. Clark will see his way to tackling the Athenæ Oxonienses! Almost more delightful are the occasional volumes of miscellaneous tracts which the Society has from time to time issued. One of these is now before us; it contains seven papers, of which four deal with mediæval subjects. Mr. H. E. D. Blakiston prints a number of documents connected with Durham College, an offshoot of the great Benedictine monastery of Durham, which once occupied the site of what is now Trinity College. Mr. Henry Furneaux edits some Latin poems referring to the famous "town and gown" row of St. Scholastica's Day, 1355. Miss Toulmin Smith contributes a calendar of Oxford Petitions in the Record Office, and Mr. A. F. Leach a most valuable catalogue of the books given by William of Wykeham to New College. The remaining contents of the volume are more modern in their scope. Mr. C. E. Doble gives us some Clarendon letters from the library of the Earl of Derby. Mr. Horace Hart, the Controller of the Clarendon Press, details the curious experiments made by the third Earl Stanhope in the art and mystery of printing. And perhaps the most interesting contribution of all is that of Mr. S. G. Hamilton, who describes the solitary attempt at university reform during the eighteenth century—the foundation of the first Hertford College by Dr. Richard Newton. Newton was an enthusiast and a pungent pamphleteer. Unfortunately he over-legislated for his college and under-financed it; yet he had high aims, and his statutes and other writings contain much sound sense. The volume, which is edited by the Chichele Professor of Modern History, is enriched with some excellent illustrations.

The Indian Calendar. By Robert Sewell and Sankara Balkrishna Dikshit. (Sonnen-schein.)

IN this country the calendar is—or, rather, seems to be—a very simple matter. Being based upon the solar year, it merely requires the adjustment of an intercalary day for leap-year. But the complications that may be introduced by a lunar year will be familiar to those who have ever considered "the several days that Easter may possibly fall upon." India, on the other hand, has not one calendar, but several, which are all founded upon most elaborate astronomical calculations. For ordinary purposes this does not cause so much practical difficulty as might be supposed, though it affords a good opportunity for display to native mathematicians. There are, however, two occasions when accurate chronology is of the first importance: in determining the dates of ancient inscriptions and of modern legal documents, in which latter class we may include the age of candidates for examinations. It is for use in these inquiries that the present work has been compiled. Of the joint authors, Mr. Sewell is well-known, not only as an active member of the Civil Service, but also as the most devoted archæologist in Southern India; while Mr. Dikshit belongs to the gifted race of Mahratta Brahmans. Between them they have produced a work of painful research, which will be appreciated only by the small band of professed Indianists. The bulk of it consists of about 140 closely printed tables of figures, which exhibit the correspondence between Hindu, Muhammadan, and Christian dates in parallel columns. Prefixed to these tables is an introduction on the Hindu calendar, which is, unfortunately, written too much from the point of view of a Hindu. Incidentally, we may mention that the difference between "current" and "expired" years is precisely the same as that which has given rise to the question whether the twentieth century will begin on January 1, 1900, or 1901. Finally, we should mention that the book also contains a table of all eclipses of the sun visible in India, from 301 to 1900 A.D., which has been prepared by Dr. Robert Schram, of Vienna.

German Social Democracy. By Bertrand Russell, B.A. (Longmans, Green & Co.) THIS is a which should command the attention of readers who wish to know something of a movement which is unquestionably gaining strength in Germany, and is acting forcibly, though indirectly, upon English political thought. The average Englishman still imagines that a Social Democrat is a rag-a-muffin who wants to blow him up with dynamite and steal his cash box in the ensuing confusion, whereas the Social Democrats already form one of the strongest among the numerous groups in the Reichstag; while Social Democracy itself is "not a mere political party, nor even a mere economic theory" (we quote the words of Mr. Russell); "it is a complete self-contained philosophy of the world and of human development, it is, in a word, a religion and an ethic." Mr. Russell's book is, in reality, a collection of six lectures delivered by him in the early part of last year at the London School of Economics and Political Science, and is both a history and a criticism of the movement from the manifesto issued by Karl Marx, in conjunction with his friend Engels, in 1847, down to the election of 1893, which gave the Social Democrats forty-four representatives in the Reichstag. As regards the history, Mr. Russell makes a strong point of the materialism and fatalism which run through Marx's philosophic system, the belief in the inevitable concentration of capital, which must finally burst the economic integument and result in Collectivism, together with the elimination of all but economic motives for human activity. The criticism of Mr. Russell is as clear and also as sympathetic as his history. For he shows how the doctrine of the concentration of capital, which lies at the root of all philosophic Social Democracy, breaks down when applied to agriculture, and holds good, if at all, only in regard to industrial enterprise. And even here we may trace a movement in the opposite direction. For few economic changes in the last few years have been more striking than the change of large firms into large companies, and the consequent admission of the small capitalist into huge commercial undertakings. Even though this tendency be not so apparent so far in Germany, its existence in England seems to strike a fatal blow at the cornerstone of Marx's philosophy. We may recommend this book as a clear presentation of the strength as well as the weakness of a system which no student of social economics can afford to neglect. Nor should we omit mention of an interesting appendix, by Alys Russell, B.A., on the "Woman Question in Germany."

Thomas Chalmers. By W. Garden Blaikie. "Famous Scots" Series. (Oliphant, Anderson, & Ferrier.)

THOMAS CHALMERS has impressed the imagination of his fellow countrymen. He was the foremost fighter in the great struggle anent patronage which led up to the Disruption, and the engineer of the Free Church Sustentation Fund. His memory is therefore dear to the members of an important religious body, and his reputation has almost won its way to the mythical. His latest biographer compares him with St. Patrick, the apostle of Ireland, for whom a Scottish parentage is claimed. To a more sober judgment he appears a man of remarkable enthusiasm and energy, a shrewd organiser, and a powerful if not very cultivated orator. He was a leader rather than a teacher of men, and one regrets that he varied the conduct of campaigns with the occupation of academic chairs. His lectures on ethics seem from Mr. Blaikie's account to have been singularly infelicitous in conception; and what shall one think of a professor of divinity who "was just beginning to know something of German philosophy when he died"? We doubt whether the life of such a man as Chalmers is best written by a partisan. A certain measure of sympathy is of course desirable, but with such detachment as may distinguish the biographer from the mere eulogist. And this appears to be imperfectly secured in Mr. Blaikie, who belongs to Chalmers's communion, and holds one of his chairs. His memoir is interesting and well-informed, but he sees the subject of it throughout in the heroic light. It is, moreover, a little irritating to have the spiritual work of a minister constantly summed up in pounds, shillings and pence. Thus,

"On his way to Glasgow he took Perth, where he preached a missionary sermon on a week-day, the collection amounting to £81 8s. In Glasgow he . . . had the great satisfaction . . . of adding four hundred to the sittings let. . . . His six weeks in Glasgow benefited the chapel to the tune of £200. . . . At Stockton . . . the collection exceeded £400."

All this is from two short pages, and reminds one of nothing so much as the professional revivalists in Mr. Harold Frederic's Illumination.

The Cathedral Church of Canterbury and The Cathedral Church of Salisbury. Edited by Gleeson White. Bell's "Cathedral" Series. (Bell.)

GRATITUDE is due to Mr. Gleeson White for these neat little green volumes, for, in truth, satisfactory guide-books to our great cathedrals are few and far between; and the traveller has too often reason to curse the enterprise and the stupidity of the local bookseller. But here he will find the fruits of a wide knowledge of literature and the allied arts, as well as a careful survey of what is by now, in the case both of Canterbury and Salisbury, a very voluminous mass of antiquarian literature. Mr. Gleeson White's information is well arranged and his illustrations are admirably chosen. In each volume he gives, first an account of whatever is known or conjectured about the history of the building, then a full and not too technical description of both exterior and interior, and finally a sketch of the fortunes of the see and of the bishops who have adorned it. The only fault we have to find is that there is no index—always a serious omission in a book, and especially so in one the usefulness of which depends largely upon the possibility of ready reference. In all other respects these guide-books are as practical as they are well-informed. Mr. Gleeson White has been at the pains to study the best authorities, and has made judicious use of them. We say Mr. Gleeson White, but as a matter of fact we do not feel quite sure whether he has written the text himself or merely given a general superintendence to the series. No name appears upon the title-pages. We may add that the lettering outside runs "The Cathedral and the City," and is misleading, for as a matter of fact no account of the city is given in either volume.

Lessing's Minna von Barnhelm. Edited by Charles Merk. (Macmillans.)

As the English mind seems to have reached perfection in the sixteenth century, and the French in the seventeenth, so did that of Germany in the eighteenth; and the three giants of the age were Lessing, Goethe, and Schiller. Frederick the Great organised victory for Germany's arms, and Lessing, beyond question the first critic of his time, did so for her literature. His keen, restless, unsparing intellect represents much that is best in, and most characteristic of, his countrymen. While Laocoon embodies the highest criticism, Nathan the Wise and Minna von Barnhelm take high rank as plays. Mr. Merk's edition of the latter is a piece of careful and thorough work. It is pleasant to come across a scholar who joins intimate knowledge of German literature to a fair English style, and uses both to give us an excellent school book. The Introduction treats clearly and with sound insight of Lessing's life and amazing mental activity. Mr. Merk has consulted the latest and best authorities, and is careful to acknowledge his debts to them. His analysis of the play is full and good, and does justice to brave, generous, lovable Tellheim, who is not unlike Thackeray's Colonel Newcome. The notes leave no difficulty unexplained, and, indeed, seem at times too full. We must laugh a little at Mr. Merk for his "penny and a half," for his incomprehensible "fall into his sword" (p. 16), and for a few other quaintnesses; and his English is occasionally ponderous. The book is, of course, got up in first-rate style, but we do not like the type used. It is less easy to read than, for instance, that of Mr. Colbeck's delightful Selections from Heine's Prose, an earlier volume of this series, and we think the change is for the worse.

Bishop Doyle. By Michael Macdonagh. "New Irish Library." (Fisher Unwin.)

JAMES WARREN DOYLE, Bishop of Kildare and Leighlin, is a remarkable figure in modern Irish history. By turns the associate and the opponent of O'Connell, he played a prominent and attractive part in the struggle for Catholic emancipation, and became the first of a long line of political bishops in Ireland. Personally he appears to have been a genuine patriot, high-minded and scrupulous, with certain quaint streaks of idealism that led him from time to time into unusual and, to the eyes of the outer world, unintelligible courses. Thus it was as an interlude between his vigorous onslaughts on the Protestant propaganda of 1823-4 that he issued his famous letter urging the re-union of the warring Churches. This was no doubt the act of a visionary; but for the most part his political attitude, though uncompromising where needful, was that of the accomplished man of affairs. One may doubt whether Ireland has ever had a more straightforward or a more sagacious leader in her troublous times. And he preached reform at home as ardently as he claimed justice from abroad. He was a stern denouncer of outrage, a vigorous purifier of ecclesiastical remissness. His short way with lazy and slovenly clerics has in it something of the Celtic turbulence and the Celtic raciness.

"He frequently tore into ribbons, on the very altar, in front of the congregation, dirty or threadbare altar-coverings and vestments, and destroyed in like manner thumb-worn missals. On one occasion he smashed to atoms with a paving-stone a cracked silver chalice, from which the sacred elements were in danger of oozing away; and on another he stripped the straw-thatch from a mean chapel and prohibited Mass from being said there till it was put into a proper condition. . . . A curate once sought to extenuate his conduct in omitting to attend a sick call by declaring that he had no horse. 'Horse, sir!' exclaimed the angry bishop, 'and a poor soul at stake; you should have mounted a cow if no other mode of conveyance had presented itself.'"

Mr. Macdonagh's book is an admirable sketch of an interesting personality, and forms a noteworthy addition to the New Irish Library.

"THE LEPIDOPTERA OF THE BRITISH ISLANDS."
—Vol. III.: Bombyces and Noctua. By Charles G. Barrett, F.E.S. (Reeve & Co.)

MR. BARRETT'S monumental work makes but slow progress. One could almost wish that he had begun at once with those families of Micro-Lepidoptera on which a reliable treatise is so much needed, and which no one is more thoroughly competent to handle than he is. But at the present rate years must intervene between us and the Tortrices. For the minute care of Mr. Barrett's descriptions, and for the valuable information he provides, not only on structure and markings but also on habits, we have nothing but praise. Mr. Barrett wisely avoids any such revolutionary rearrangement of the accepted classification as that attempted by Mr. Meyrick in his recent ingenious treatise. Such a rearrangement can only be tentative in our present state of knowledge, and in any case ought to be done by a committee. On the other hand we should have been grateful to Mr. Barrett for a dichotomy such as Mr. Meyrick, and even in some measure Stainton, give us. Dichotomies are not perhaps highly scientific, but they are an incalculable boon to the field naturalist.

Undine: a Tale by Friedrich Baron de la Motte Fouqué. Translated by Edmund Gosse. With Illustrations by F. M. Rudland. (Lawrence & Bullen.)

This is an entirely new version of Fouqué's popular and interesting romance. Mr.

Gosse's skill as a translator is well known, and the amiable sentimentality of the German suits his style admirably. He has prefixed a brief sketch of Fouqué's life and a good critical summary of his place in letters. But the chief charm of the volume is in the drawings, by F. M. Rudland, which it contains. One knows not whether most to admire the command of technical resources which they display, or the essential beauty and decorative qualities of the design, or the sympathy with which the feeling and spirit of the story is interpreted. Without being in the least imitative, they just suggest, as is most suitable, the manner of the old German wood-engravers. If we must criticise at all, the figures are in two or three places out of drawing, and the subaqueous pictures please us less than the rest. But taken as a whole, the book is a most notable contribution to the achievement of the growing English school of illustrators.

"GRANT ALLEN'S HISTORICAL GUIDES."—Paris and Florence. (Grant Richards.)

MR. GRANT ALLEN'S variousness and industry are amazing. We have known him as biologist, as evolutionist, as poet, as translator, as philosopher, as essayist, as satirist, as journalist, and pre-eminently as novelist. In filling so many rôles one would have thought that his time was sufficiently occupied; and yet we now learn from the preface prefixed to each of these books that for the past thirty-five years Mr. Allen has been accumulating material on the spot for the series of Historical Guides, the first two volumes of which lie before us. By calling them historical Mr. Allen in part indicates their plan, which is to supplement rather than supplant the existing handbooks. In his own words,

"I desire to supply the tourist who wishes to use his travel as a means of culture with such historical and antiquarian information as will enable him to understand, and therefore to enjoy, the architecture, sculpture, painting, and minor arts of the towns he visits."

Looking through the volumes casually we notice the most commendable decision and charity of style, a helpful brevity, and considerable vigour of opinion. The reader must be willing to abide trustingly in Mr. Allen's hands. The publisher has furnished the guides with limp covers and markers, thus suiting them for pocket companions.

Fables and Fabulists. By Thomas Newbigging. (Elliot Stock.)

THIS is a cheap edition of Mr. Newbigging's essay. It has no claim to exact erudition or original research, but it gives a fair general outline of its subject in a popular fashion. The range covered is wide, from Æsop to Krilof. There is a fine want of historical perspective in the following sentence: "The 'Gesta' is a rich storehouse from which many poets, including Gower, Chaucer, Spenser, Shakespeare, Parnell, and others have borrowed." Mr. Newbigging's indebtedness to the various writings of Mr. Joseph Jacobs is acknowledged on most of the pages, and is obvious on all.

The Dickens Dictionary. By Gilbert A. Pierce and William A. Wheeler. (Chapman & Hall.)

No novelist needs a dictionary (directory would perhaps be the better word) more than Dickens, for no novelist is so well known by patches. There are many persons, for example, who would never again go through Martin Chuzzlewit from first page to last, yet who yield to no Dickensian in enthusiasm. Of these, one will prize the book for Mrs. Gamp, another for Mr. Bailey, another for Mr. Pecksniff, another for Tom Pinch, another for Mark Tapley, and so on. The Dickens Dictionary directs the reader, though not perhaps with sufficient particularity, to the places where these favourites may be found—hence its value. At the same time there is still room for a complete Dickens Concordance based on a standard edition; say, the new "Gadshill" edition—for the authors of this work which seems to be of American origin, are not too thorough. For instance, they omit to mention Mrs. Harris! and their references, though not confined to characters only, are in other respects very meagre. The illustrative passages make the book interesting in itself.

Kidnapped in London. By Sun Yat Sen. (Arrowsmith.)

MR. SUN YAT SEN states in his preface that he feels he would be failing in his duty if he did not place on public record all the circumstances connected with that "historical event"—his detention at the Chinese Legation. This is a serious view to take, especially at a time when we groan beneath the burden of superfluous books; it is, we are disposed to think, too serious. But to those who are not yet sated with the Chinaman's experiences and the evening papers' elaborations thereof, this book may be interesting. To us it is not. Had Sun Yat Sen written it himself we might have found it so, but told in another's journalese it is not stimulating.

The Year's Art. Compiled by A. C. R. Carter. (Virtue.)

THIS is the eighteenth annual issue of a very useful work. After leading off with a retrospect of the art of 1896 by Mr. R. A. M. Stevenson and its architecture by Mr. H. Heathcote Statham, the book becomes strictly authoritative and business-like. The full-page portraits of artists have been well-chosen, many of them representing just those men in whom students of the art of last year are particularly interested.

The Year's Music: a Record of British and Foreign Musical Events. (Virtue.)

THIS record of musical performances, publications, and occurrences during 1896 is issued by the same firm whose Year's Art, noticed above, is so admirable a work of reference. We cannot yet extend quite the same praise to The Year's Music, but there is every sign that it may in time develop as satisfactorily.

THE TEACHING OF ENGLISH LITERATURE IN SCHOOLS.

A FEW years ago English literature as a subject of teaching had no place, or at all events no certain place, in our scholastic system. It is now very properly not only a recognised but an essential part of the instruction given in almost every school. And yet it is, I think, generally admitted that its teaching has somehow not been a success, that we have not made of it what we might have been expected to make of it. With other subjects we know where we are and what we can do, but here it is complained everything seems to be uncertain. The reasons for this are not far to seek. No one who has had extended experience as an examiner in this subject, and who has thus been brought into contact with the various methods and, by implication, various theories of teaching, can fail to be struck with the want of uniformity among them. In one school he finds himself requested to set a paper on the general history of English literature during a particular century or period; in another, a paper on Chaucer and Langland, including Middle English, or, it may be, on particular plays of Shakespeare, essays of Bacon, or books of Spenser; in another, a paper not on a portion of the work, but on the works generally of some English classic. And the diversity in the quality and character of the answers given is not less remarkable. In some they are obviously the result of instruction mechanically imparted and mechanically acquired—pure cram-work; in others, as obviously the result of superior teaching which has been far over the heads of the pupils, of an attempt to erect a superstructure where there has been no foundation. In others, again, the teacher's aim has obviously been to vitalise his subject by presenting it sympathetically and eloquently, and the failure here is in solidity and thoroughness. Now in education all moves from above. What I have described has resulted to a very great extent, on the one hand, from that conception of the aims and methods of literary instruction which has found its embodiment in our academic system, and on the other from the reaction against that conception which is now happily setting in. I happen to have before me the regulations for the Pass and Honours degree in English literature of the London University for 1893. It is this:

"(1) History of English Literature from 1815—1833. Extracts from Sweet's Primer and Alfred's 'Orosius.' 'Sir Bevis of Northampton' (parts i., ii.). Scott: Essays on 'Chivalry' and 'Romance.' Wordsworth: 'White Doe of Rylstone.'"

"(2) History of English Literature from 1833—1850. 'Beowulf,' Cantos xxxiii. to xliii. Specimens of Early English, ed. Morris (part i.): 'The Owl and Nightingale,' extract and moral ode. Tennyson: 'In Memoriam.' Carlyle: 'Heroes, Hero-worship, and the Heroic in History'; the first three lectures. Macaulay: Essays on 'Addison,' and 'Madame D'Arblay.'"

In this extraordinary farrago the first thing that strikes us is the impossibility of forming even the faintest conjecture as to the principle underlying its constitution. Why the history of English literature between 1815 and 1833, or again between 1833 and 1850, when these periods, so far from marking epochs, intersect them? With what purpose are the particular works prescribed for special study selected? For their importance, historically, as illustrating the evolution of our literature? For the importance of their relation to the literature contemporary with them? For their intrinsic interest and value because they represent what is best, what is classical in the eras to which they belong? Let any person of common sense ask himself how such a course as this could possibly lead to anything but to confusion and smattering. Whether it be regarded as designed to encourage and secure a knowledge of the history of literature, or an intelligent acquaintance with its masterpieces, to serve the ends of positive instruction or to serve the ends of liberal culture it is equally absurd. To slice off a few inches of the human body taken casually, and to require a minute knowledge of their anatomical structure, and as the result of that knowledge to grant a diploma in anatomy, would not be more ridiculous than the principle on which the general history of literature is here treated. How far the careful study of the extracts in Mr. Sweet's Primer, of the "Beowulf," of Alfred's "Orosius," of "Sir Bevis," of the "Owl and Nightingale," and of the slovenly composition of Scott's essays on "Chivalry" and "Romance" is likely to conduce to the sort of discipline which we look to the study of literature to supply, is a question which these legislators have probably not considered. It is possible that their compromise with "culture" is represented by the introduction of Tennyson's "In Memoriam," Macaulay's "Addison" and "Madame D'Arblay," and, to complete this grotesque conglomeration, Wordsworth's "White Doe." And what is the result of these regulations? Precisely the result which they are calculated to produce, and the result which such regulations always will and always must produce. Their appearance each year is followed by a series of cram-books. The period of English literature lying between the prescribed dates is mapped out in divisions and sub-divisions. The principal authors, with their chief works lead-lined, and with the scope and purport of each of these works condensed into a few words, are arranged in groups: two or three paragraphs epitomise their biographies, two or three paragraphs their "essential characteristics." The minor writers of any importance are enumerated and treated, though on a less extended scale, in the same way. By methods not less expeditious, and educationally speaking not less unprofitable, what is required of Anglo-Saxon and Middle English is made equally easy of attainment. It would be no exaggeration to say that a curriculum more adapted to defeat all the true aims of literary instruction could not possibly be devised. The connecting link between this system and the schools is afforded by the Oxford and Cambridge Higher Local Examinations, which, modified by the elimination of philology, are marked by the same features and conduce to the same end. A reaction against all this is now setting in, the effect of which is in some schools sheer perplexity, finding expression in timid compromise, in others the determined rejection of a bad system for no system at all. But how is all this to be remedied? It seems to me that the great mistake we make in the teaching of English literature in schools is that we do not teach it systematically; that we leave undefined and unconnected the natural stages in its progressive study, as well as its relation to discipline and culture and its relation to positive knowledge. The first would be obviated by dividing the period of school-life, averaging from the ages of ten to seventeen, into three stages—the elementary, the middle, the advanced—and by assigning to each period the instruction proper to it. In the elementary stage the sole object should be to get the pupil interested in such parts of the subject as can be rendered attractively intelligible, and to require nothing further in the way of serious effort than learning simple poetry by heart. During the next stage should be laid the foundation of the historical study of the subject—that is, of a knowledge of its evolution and of its relation to history, as well as of its appreciation as a means of discipline and culture. But what relates to its historical study should certainly be confined to the broad outlines, not extending to particulars and minutiae. If the teacher contented himself with showing that the development of literature is an unbroken process of evolution, that its division into epochs is justifiable only for purposes of convenience for study, explained what an epoch meant, divided our literature into the various eras into which it is susceptible of division, assigning the reasons for the boundary dates, as much would be done as is desirable. These eras and the reasons for their assignation should certainly be committed to memory. What should represent the foundation of moral æsthetic and critical culture should be the getting by heart passages both from prose and verse which are sublime and noble in sentiment, or which exemplify most perfectly supreme excellence in the various phases assumed in composition; and to this should be added elocution. Not that odious theatrical falsetto which so often usurps its name, but good reading in the proper sense of the term—reading with sympathy and intelligence. Repetition is, of course, a prominent feature in school discipline, but it now seems designed only to strengthen the memory; how little is made of it compared with what might be made, how unsystematic, how injudicious often is the choice of the passages prescribed. To have by heart the gems of classical literature, whether in our own or in other languages, is to possess what may pass insensibly, or be developed by subsequent study, into critical standards and touchstones. At this stage it would also be proper to begin the study of some of the simpler masterpieces of our literature as well as to have instruction about the passages already learnt by heart. Here, too, would naturally begin grammar, syntax, and etymology, which should certainly include the elements of Anglo-Saxon. On these foundations the pupil passes from the middle to the advanced stage, and would now be past or bordering upon fifteen. Now might profitably be read some lively and pleasantly written history of English literature, such as, in the case of girls, Miss Anna Buckland's Story of English Literature; in the case of boys, Shaw's Students' Manual, Chambers's excellent Cyclopædia, or, under a competent teacher, Mr. Stopford Brooke's Primer. This would fill in the sketches commenced in the second stage. Every endeavour should be made to associate the study of literature with that of history, the pupils being taught to understand their intimate, their essential connexion—that they are indeed different manifestations of the same energies: the one being their translation into action, the other their translation into words—one of those obvious truths that seems never to be recognised. The pupil would now, or during this stage, be advanced in French, probably in German, and, if belonging to a classical school, in Greek and Latin. All these bear, or might be made to bear, on his English studies. Side by side with historical study would come the study of the works of particular authors, which though linked indissolubly with historical study may be regarded chiefly as the medium of moral, æsthetic, and critical discipline and culture.

The advantages of a system of instruction thus defined and graduated are surely as obvious as the fact that from a total disregard of such definition and graduation have sprung the unsatisfactoriness and inefficiency of so much of the teaching in this subject. The course of a particular study should proceed on the same principle as education as a whole proceeds. What is learned between the age of ten and twelve is preliminary to what is learned between twelve and fourteen, while the instruction received at that age prepares the way for the age that follows. Suddenly to plunge a boy or girl into a play of Shakespeare, a book of Spenser, or a chapter of Mr. Stopford Brooke's Primer, without much preliminary instruction, is as absurd as it would be to plunge a child into logarithms before it had learned the multiplication table. It is by no means uncommon for teachers to proceed on the assumption—nay, to be obliged to do so—that knowledge which should have been acquired at earlier stages has been acquired, while it has not. It is of great moment that one of the chief ends of literary instruction should be kept steadily in view, and that is its relation to moral and æsthetic discipline and culture. To the Greeks the great poets were what the Bible is to us. But this side of poetry is in our teaching very generally ignored. How much, in the hands of a competent teacher, might, for instance, be made out of the Faery Queen, the tragedies of Shakespeare, Milton's Comus, select poems from Wordsworth, Tennyson, and Browning. With the study of poetry might be associated with advantage the study of Sidney's fine and inspiring little treatise, the Apology for Poetry. And this leads me to speak of criticism, as an element in a curriculum of literature. No critical works should be admitted into it except such as are of classical authority or such as have received the imprimatur of unimpeachable judges.

In classical schools the study of the Greek and Roman authors should, as far as possible, be connected with that of the study of our own; for each would vitalise the other. Why with the Greek tragedies should not the class be reading in the English lesson Milton's Samson Agonistes, or Matthew Arnold's Merope, or Shelley's Prometheus Unbound; with Homer and Virgil, Tennyson's Idylls; with Horace and Juvenal, Pope's and Johnson's Imitations; with Pindar, Gray and Collins; with Horace's Ars Poetica, Pope's Essay on Criticism. The same correlation might, in schools where Greek and Latin is not taught, be arranged with the works usually read in French and German.

If in what I have said about the definition and graduation of the study of our literature it be objected that I have simply urged a counsel of perfection, I can only reply that what I have suggested is susceptible of easily practicable modification. The point of importance is the eduction of system out of confusion, and the application of right theories and methods for what not only the most competent judges, but ordinary experience itself, have pronounced to be palpably wrong ones.

J. CHURTON COLLINS.

"BALLOW" TO "BLARE."

WHEN a publication contains—as this, the second part of the English Dialect Dictionary, does—2,695 simple and compound words, and 267 phrases, illustrated by 13,295 references, criticism becomes a little difficult. On the other hand, quotation becomes rather easy; and we therefore propose to lay Dr.

Joseph Wright's colossal work under contribution, saying nothing more critical than that Part II. covers the ground from "Ballow" to "Blare"; that it is a monument of patience and pains; and that we are as much distressed by the number of inverted "e's" in the text as the editor and Mrs. Henry Frowde themselves must be.

To the ordinary reader, not an etymologist, the great value of such a dictionary is its raciness. Every word is from the soil, direct, before literature has had time to intervene. Every word was coined by some man or woman (quite as likely to have been a woman as a man) who wanted before all things to give expression to a thought or feeling. Hence they are always forcible and picturesque, and frequently onomatopoeic. The unlettered rustic, inclined to be censorious or descriptive, gets his words as he wants them the first time,—unlike the literary man, who must seek laboriously. Indeed, for the literary man who is weary of eternally ringing the changes on the old, old words common to all writers (for how few there are who essay neologism! and the revival of archaisms is perilous) Dr. Wright's columns are a boon and a blessing. Here is so little artifice, so much nature. Here the tired writer may rest and recuperate, as a City clerk rests and recuperates on the Margate sands. Glancing quite casually at these pages, he will find words so rich in quality that his conversation is likely to resolve itself into a mere device for their introduction.

For a teasing child what could be a better word than "belter-werrits"? "O deary me," says the Lincolnshire mother, "what a belter-werrits thoo art, bairn!" In Yorkshire the whimperings of a spoilt child are called "bessy-babishness"; and in Durham a woman of slatternly appearance is a "bessy-fruggam." In Kent they say "ban" instead of "swear": "He bann'd him to the pit of hell." In Nottinghamshire the willow-wren is called the "banky-feather-poke"; we find also "bash," for to hit; "barnish," for to grow fat; "baum-rappit," for an appearance or ghost (how the Society for Psychical Research would score if it changed its name to the Baum-Rappit Community!); "beggugled," for destroyed by mud or slime; "begrumped," for displeased; "belly-vengeance," for bad liquor, and so on. These are good, resonant, straightforward words, better far than the tame and faded locutions of the drawing-room. It is fortunate for the student of dialects that human beings are prone to threats and censure, for the best words seem to carry abuse with them. And hence, possibly, the exceptional richness of the letter "B," for our lips are always ready to begin a word with "B"; and when one is enraged and speech unpremeditated, the labials have fullest play. In Yorkshire, particularly, is the letter "B" esteemed, and there are few of the thousands of words collected by Dr. Wright for the "B" section which are not heard in their glory on the Dales.

Out of the total number of 13,295 references in this second part alone many are records of actual remarks made by villagers and copied down by Dr. Wright's assistants; and these are the most interesting. The illustrations quoted from books never seem to have quite such freshness. Take, for instance, this use of "bang," a great word truly, in its sense as a verb meaning to beat, to surpass, to outdo—A Lincolnshire squire having asked a farmer some questions concerning the cultivation of land, received the reply, "Well, sir, God's seasons bangs all manigement." The same word is illustrated rather artfully by a Lancashire correspondent: "This dickshonary bangs Sam Johnson's o to pieces." Under "barber" (to shave) we get this sententious pronouncement from North Lincolnshire: "I alus barber mysen o' Setterda' neet ready for Sunda'. No real Christian iver barber'd hissen o' a Sunda', thoo knows that, thoo reprobate." The correspondent caps this with the following tale of iniquity:

"About forty years ago, Thomas Carr, a poor man, living at Kirton-in-Lindsey, called on the Rev. Robert Ousby, the curate, and said: 'Sir, I've heard a straange, bad taale aboot you. I know it isn't trew, but I want to hear you contradict it fra yer awn mooth. A man tohd me last neet 'at you alus barber'd yersen on a Sunda' mornin'."

Alas, it was true! In Cumberland to "bark at t' heck" is to wait outside the door, usually for a girl. Thus: "Jwhon Simpton goes efter Mary Wilson, and barks at t' heck, but she willent hev him." Another meaning of "bark" (the skin) elicits this fragment from Worcester-shire: "'The doctor says I've got no bark to my inside,' said a woman, who had been told that the coating of the stomach was destroyed." "Bellowses," the double plural of bellows, is common to most blacksmiths wherever they dwell, but the only poet who has used the word is probably the Exeter cobbler who advertised: "Here lives a man what don't refuse To mend umbrellases, bellowses, boots and shoes." In Somerset, "belong" has the inverted meaning of to own, to possess. A correspondent writes:

"For the question, 'To whom do these houses belong?' we should say, 'Who do belong to these houses?'—'Be you the gnilmun, make so bold, that do belong to this here house?' At any fair or market it is very common to hear, 'Who do belong to these here bullicks?'"

Connoisseurs of tea who think they are acquainted with all possible brands may like to know of an old woman in Cumberland who said she had made her husband "mint tea, and baum-tea and Rob-run-by-the-dyke tea, but he wad hae nought but the real thing!"

Here and there Dr. Wright touches on ground covered by Messrs. Henley and Farmer in their Slang and its Analogues, now in preparation. Thus we find that that picturesque idiom of the streets and Halls of Variety—"Barmy on the Crumpet,"—which most people take to be a piece of pure Cockney slang, is really an adaptation of the word "barmy," signifying silly, weak-minded, half-witted, common in Yorkshire and several other counties. Barm, of course, is yeast. Elsewhere, Dr. Wright, by the way, supplies cricketers with three words not too well known except in certain districts. In East Yorkshire, according to "J. N.," it was the custom to say "bamboozle" where we ordinarily say "slog" or "swipe." Thus:

"If a bowler sent up a careless ball, the batsman was counselled 'Ti bamboozle it well'; and if he succeeded in driving it far away, whereby several runs were obtained, he was rewarded by cries of 'Weel bamboozled!'"

Again, in Ireland, and possibly Cheshire, a challenge to play a match is a "banter"; and at Winchester (but this is better known) a half volley is a "barter," and to hit one hard is to "barter" it. This word, however, is slang, finding its origin in one Barter, famous for his drives.

ACADEMY PORTRAITS.

XII.—ROBERT SOUTHEY.

THE fact that Southey's Life of Nelson has just been included in a popular series of English classics is not a proof that the public is interested in Southey. It is merely a reminder that there has been what is called a naval boom. As a matter of fact, no one at this moment is the least interested in Southey. It would be as though he never were, save that at school little boys and girls are still committing to memory "It was a summer evening, Old Kaspar's work was done," and are still being languidly amused by the "Well of St. Keyne," and languidly impressed by the fate of Bishop Hatto; and, in the British Museum, needy journalists in search of some gem of erudition with which to deck out a threadbare article are still aware of no better place to seek it than Southey's Commonplace Book. For the rest Southey does not count, except for the Nelson book, which is great; and for the fact that here and there one comes upon an adherent of the old school who will affirm, with much feeling, that for real salty humour there is nothing to touch The Doctor. The Doctor!—if Southey had but found time earlier to do more in the manner of that tremendous book how much wider his influence might be! But he was as hard-worked as any man of letters ever was, and his mind relaxed rarely. But The Doctor had geniality and blood, and was much more the work of a good man (such as Southey notably was) in a good humour than a zealous bookworm. A spice of the true Shandyan wit, which it strove after in vain, would have made it a living thing to this hour, instead of a splendid mummy. Southey's performances were never, alas! quite equal to his promise. No one has left behind so interesting a list of projected works.

Probably no poet of this century, once so considerable and popular as Southey, is now less read. His works are to be found in all representative libraries, but they are not taken down except to dust. Thalaba, Roderick, The Curse of Kehama—these no longer exercise their old spell; their day is past. Even Madoc has died—Madoc, "the best English poem," according to its author, "since Paradise Lost." Once, however, they sold in their thousands; and very properly, since the appointment added greatly to the vivacity of Lord Byron's muse,

Southey was made Laureate. His true work, however, lay not in poetry, but in study. The world probably has known no finer reader, not even Gibbon. Southey read the best of everything and remembered it: his store of learning was tremendous: he was bookman to the marrow. In his own words:

"My days among the dead are passed;
Around me I behold,
Where'er these casual eyes are cast,
The mighty minds of old;
My never failing friends are they,
With whom I converse night and day."

The Commonplace Books and The Doctor grew out of this omnivorous reading, and Southey's Quarterly articles are wealthy in a way hardly to be understood to-day. He knew something of everything, and everything of the literature of Spain. In 1840 Wordsworth called and found him in the library, patting his books affectionately with both hands like a child. It was the beginning of the end. Southey died, worn out with study, in 1843. No man ever tried harder to use his powers to the fullest with benefit to his fellow men.

Our portrait is from a pencil sketch in the National Portrait Gallery, very little larger than the reproduction. Southey was thirty when it was made.

THE PUBLIC SCHOOL PRODUCT.

A REJOINDER REVIEWED.

To those who perused Mr. Ready's article on "The Public School Product" in a recent number of the New Review, we may commend Mr. Almond's "Rejoinder" in the January issue. Mr. Almond has perhaps delivered his soul somewhat copiously, and has bestowed upon us a disquisition de omnibus rebus et quibusdam aliis in education. Still what he says is worth reading; for, on the whole, what he says most schoolmasters think. But before proceeding further we must hasten to clear away a singular delusion with which Mr. Almond seems to be possessed. Judging from a remark on p. 85, he appears to be under the misguided impression that the term "public school" is confined to a certain class of boarding-schools, his words being "I know of no public school where the average stay exceeds four years." We have always understood that any school which is under the management of a governing body, and of which the headmaster is not the proprietor, but is an elected official, is a public school.

The evidence collected by the writer of the "Rejoinder" concerning over-pressure in Army-classes tallies with the report quoted at the recent Conference at Rugby as having been sent to parents by the master of one of these classes, in which he stated that he was preparing their sons for Woolwich or for Hanwell. On the other hand, Mr. Bowen, of Harrow, whose opinion on the question is of great weight, expressed himself in the Times of December 25 last as perfectly satisfied with both the quantity and the quality of the work prescribed for entrance to Woolwich and Sandhurst. Whether Mr. Bowen or the coach for Hanwell be right it is hard to say; but however this may be, it is notorious that under the present system of selection, in which there is no real physical or personal trial, the Army does not get for its commissions anything like so serviceable or so good a stamp of lad as it might. It is likely that in the place of every boy who has been passed into the military colleges the headmaster of his school could have chosen another, who, with probably equal, if slightly different, mental powers, possessed far higher qualifications in regard to physique, energy, common sense, and talent for organisation. It may be admitted that it would be difficult, and it might be dangerous, to accept the principle of recommendation, and it is manifest that most of the above valuable qualities do not readily lend themselves to examination; but bodily vigour does. The Indian Forest Service exacts from applicants for admission a thirty-mile walk, and much noise is made over this trifling test. Most "crocks" could manage to struggle through one such tramp without revealing their "crockerly"; but why not begin by making every candidate for the Army walk twenty-five or thirty miles a day for a week, and then by all means examine the knowledge and the intelligence (which are not the same thing) of the survivors? It is not easy to believe that we should lose many embryo Marlboroughs or Wellingtons by the application of this extra preliminary sieve; surely even the modern "scientific soldier" to be of any use must be a man in the completest sense of the word, and therefore, inter alia, must be of proved grit and endurance. Mr. Almond, like every good schoolmaster, is severe upon "lines" and "detention." It was the sentimentalist and the humanitarian who, with theoretically the best intentions, but with practically the most senseless cruelty, flouted the wisdom of Solomon and procured the substitution of these fiendish yet ineffective punishments for the natural and time-honoured birch and cane. Certainly neither master, nor boy, nor parent, owes them one pennyworth of thanks. That the rod was flourished rather too freely in former generations is no argument for its virtual abolition. We need not be either teetotallers or toppers: manet sors tertia, let us be "moderate drunkards." With the dictum that "from two to three hours is the average minimum which every boy or girl should spend in open-air exercise" we are in thorough agreement, and would add that in this country no weather is ever sufficiently bad to justify its being pleaded as an excuse for the reduction of that minimum.

The writer winds up with a vindication of the old classical training, and with a tilt at the tuck-shop. Doubtless both these institutions are safe enough; the classics stand in little need of Mr. Almond's defence, and the tuck-shop will suffer little from his defiance. The well-known medical officer of a great school has informed us that the constitutions of schoolboys and ladies require an amount of stimulation by saccharine matter that would be disastrous to the internal economy of the adult male. With the tenacity of her sex Dame Nature will have her way; and, even though "tucker" be expelled with the proverbial pitchfork, Jones minor will get his brandy-balls from some inferior source, to the detriment of his digestion, and to the depletion of the revenues of his school—but get them he will. And, if the lollipop is strong in the consciousness of right, so, too, is the old classical training. Its enemies, moreover, are too unorganised, too mutually jealous, and too obviously second-rate to wreak it much harm. The chances are that it will stoutly hold its own for a very long time yet against the motley and internecine rabble of "modern subjects" that clamour around it. When the two Universities have been absorbed by the Extension colleges, and have been forced to bring their Schools and Triposes "up-to-date," and to grant their degrees for shorthand, book-keeping, and type-writing, then, and not till then, will the languages of Greece and Rome become defunct, and with them that higher culture which they alone can give.

NOTES AND NEWS.

WE have received from Mr. G. F. Russell Barker a lengthy correspondence relating to an article by him on "Prosperity" Robinson in the Dictionary of National Biography, and his quarrel with his editor concerning an interpolation. This correspondence, which is too long to print, we have carefully read, and we cannot come to any other conclusion than that Mr. Barker, though unfortunate, is wrong. The facts are simple. Mr. Barker wrote on Robinson and corrected the proof. The editor, finding what he thought an ambiguous passage, inserted a sentence. The sentence contained two mistakes, which a Times reviewer fastened upon. Mr. Barker was naturally disturbed and sought the editor, Mr. Sidney Lee. Mr. Lee was out of town for a few days. Instead of waiting for his return, and calling again and settling the matter in square talk, Mr. Barker made what we are bound to consider a serious mistake: he wrote to Mr. Smith, of Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co., the publishers of the Dictionary, disclaiming responsibility. This step was contrary to all sound journalistic etiquette. A contributor has to do only with his editor.

On the same day, unwitting of this letter to the publisher, Mr. Lee, within a few minutes of his return to town, wrote to Mr. Barker expressing regret for the error in the article, but pointing out that the responsibility should be shared by both. Mr. Barker replied by enclosing his letter to Mr. Smith, and Mr. Lee replied to that by the statement that owing to Mr. Barker having pursued so irregular a course as that of approaching Mr. Smith, he was compelled to remove Mr. Barker's name from the list of contributors, although Mr. Barker was at liberty to complete all articles already arranged for. Other letters followed, including one from Mr. Lee to the Times exonerating Mr. Barker; but the case was virtually closed at this point. We are sorry for Mr. Barker, but Mr. Lee, we think, has acted as he was bound to. Mistakes occurred on both sides, but Mr. Barker's mistake was the more serious.

MR. BARKER, in submitting to us these letters, writes as follows: "I send you the enclosed correspondence between the editor and publisher of the Dictionary of National Biography and myself, thinking that it may be of some interest to those who contribute signed articles to dictionaries, reviews, and other works. In the letter which he was obliged at last to write to the Times, Mr. Lee, wisely abandoning his former contention that I was in part responsible for the blunder, says, 'In the course of editorial revision an error was accidentally introduced here into the article.' The word 'accidentally' seems a curious one to use, for nobody would suppose that Mr. Lee would purposely insert a blunder in an article for the Dictionary of National Biography. Yet he cannot mean that the sentence was 'accidentally' interpolated in my article, for I have good reason to believe that an elementary text-book on English history was gravely consulted by the learned staff before the sentence was inserted. What I really wish, however, to point out is, that the contributor never had an opportunity of seeing this 'editorial revision.' It was done after the proof of the article had been corrected and returned by the contributor to the editor. For my own part, I cannot see what possible right an editor has to alter a signed article without first obtaining the consent of the contributor, under whose name the article is to appear in print. But this is a point which Mr. Lee discreetly shirks in his letter to the Times."

THERE is a "dome in air" other than that which Coleridge would have built under contingencies readers of Kubla Khan will remember. The Dome now in air is a quarterly magazine of high aspirations, the first number of which will be published in March.

THE death of Mrs. Hungerford, the author of Molly Bawn and a large number of similar novels, will be regretted by the very extensive company of readers whom her stories have beguiled. Molly Bawn was as good as any of those that followed it; they had all the same vivacity of style and described very similar persons, and all were good-humoured and productive of good humour. Mrs. Hungerford was one of Mr. James Payn's discoveries. In America Molly Bawn gives place to The Duchess as first favourite. Two new stories from this busy pen will appear in the spring.

OUIDA's contribution to the Westminster Gazette's symposium on reviewing is very pleasing. She writes: "As there are not more than two out of every hundred books issued in England worth the paper they are printed on, it would be well if the Press gave more attention to the two, and none at all to the other ninety-eight." And she adds: "I think, too, that there should be no anonymous expressions of opinion. Anonymity lends a fictitious importance to journalists, as the wig and gown to an advocate."

MR. G. W. STEEVENS cannot be accused of any lack of thoroughness. He was sent to America in the interests of the Daily Mail to write descriptive letters of the country and the election. He wrote them, and wrote them exceedingly well too, and the articles appeared in the Daily Mail. Now they have been collected in a book called The Land of the Dollar, and Mr. Steevens reviews it himself, also in the Daily Mail. There is something pleasantly symmetrical about this proceeding. Mr. Steevens seems both to like the book and to dislike it, which is the right attitude for a conscientious author. In the end, he advises Mr. Balfour to give the writer a pension, and declares his opinion that a copy should be in every home and cottage, if only negatively to instruct the nation in literary style.

COPENHAGEN is just now being entertained by a quarrel raging between Ibsen and Björnson. Although Ibsen's son is married to Björnson's daughter, the relations between the two fathers have long been strained, and the publication of John Gabriel Borkman has brought the difference to a head. Björnson, it seems, believes the play to contain covertly a series of attacks upon himself, and he has publicly accused Ibsen of the same. There are passages in his life known, he affirms, probably only to Ibsen, which have been reproduced. A man does not often fit a cap upon himself with such pains. Björnson, it is expected, will reply in kind before long.

MEANWHILE the Scandinavia Press Bureau has sent the following emphatic message to this country: "We are authorised by Dr. Ibsen most positively to contradict the statement that he has aimed at Björnson in the play of John Gabriel Borkman. Dr. Ibsen further says that he never aims at real personages in his plays."

WE hear of the formation of a Dürer Society, for the purpose of publishing in a convenient and accessible form the rarer or more desirable works of the Nuremberg master, and of his German and Italian contemporaries. Dürer's drawings, as most know, have been published in Berlin by Dr. Lippmann, but his volumes cost many guineas, and the reproductions by Amand Durand and others are hardly more easy of access. On this ground alone there should be a field for the new society, which has already succeeded in obtaining special concessions from the authorities of the Louvre and other continental galleries, as well as from private owners of Dürer originals.

AN initial portfolio of Dürer reproductions is even now in course of preparation, although so far no attempt has been made to extend the privileges of the society beyond the narrow bounds of a small circle of artists and enthusiasts among whom the idea arose. We gather that among the special advantages enjoyed by the society is the fact that it can command practically all the best modern processes of reproduction, instead of being at the mercy of alien engravers and reproducers. It will be interesting to see how a society constituted on these lines will thrive. The secretary, to whom communications should be addressed, is Mr. S. M. Peartree, 12, Chalcot gardens, Haverstock Hill.

SOME entertaining pages about literary beggars in Paris occur in The Beggars of Paris, a translation by Lady Herschell of the Paris qui Mendie of M. Louis Paulian. (Edward Arnold.) The complimentary poet is a recognised character in the gay, compliment-loving city. This is how he acts: "He leaves an envelope with the concierge, and says he will call for the answer in the evening. The envelope contains a letter and a piece of poetry—some verses which are, in truth, far from bad. In the letter the poet complains that he is hungry, and begs you to leave with your concierge 'a simple piece of bread, which will be received with gratitude and devoured with delight.'" The verses are always the same, and so is the result. "Men of letters," M. Paulian reminds us, "have hearts . . . ; every one of them will give money instead of bread."

M. PAULIAN knows one complimentary poet who stocks acrostics with the method and completeness of a large homœopathic chemist: "'You see, sir,' the beggar said to me one day, 'in our trade unforeseen things happen, one must always be ready beforehand. No doubt there are names, such as Mary, Margaret, which come more often than others. But every name is wanted sooner or later, and if I had not some Cunégonde, Perpétin, Monique, and Pétronille, written out beforehand, I should in a busy time, such as a Saturday, risk losing my gains.' By taking care to keep his stock of acrostics always complete, our man never misses his fee."

IN the belief that Westward Ho! cannot be too accessible, we extend a welcome to the new editions of the book which Messrs. Macmillan have just published. At the same time, it is a little bewildering to have three editions of Kingsley's romance in two months. First came the two-volume illustrated edition at a guinea; and now, with fewer of the same illustrations, comes a three-and-sixpenny edition in the "Peacock" series; and with it a shilling copy with eight of the same pictures. The artist is Mr. C. E. Brock, and we should think that few men's drawings have gone so far.

A FACSIMILE of a translation made in 1544, by the Princess Elizabeth, of Le Miroir de l'âme Pécheresse, Margaret of Navarre's poem, is to be published by Messrs. Asher & Co. The presentation volume, now in the Bodleian, from which the facsimile is made, was written and bound by the little princess, who was then only eleven. The binding of the original consists of ornamental filigree work of gold and silver wire on a ground of blue corded silk, with the initials K. P. in the middle of each cover. The dedication states, "therefore have i . . . translated this lytell boke out of frenche ryme into englishe prose: coynng the sentences together as well as the capacite of my symple witte and small lerning coulede extende themselves. The wich booke is intytled or named the miroir or glasse of the synnefull soule." The dedication is headed, "To our moste noble and vertuous queene Katherin, Elizabeth her humble daughter wisheth perpetuall felicitie and everlasting ioye"; and ends, "From asherige the laste daye of the yeare of our lorde god, 1544." The editor is Mr. Percy W. Ames.

THE London Reform Union has just issued a penny reprint (and a shilling édition de luxe) of the address on "London: Mediæval and Elizabethan," which Sir Walter Besant delivered to the Union about six weeks ago. In his prefatory remarks, dated a week ago, Sir Walter gently replies to the strictures of his chairman, Lord Rosebery, who, it will be remembered, declined to endorse the adjective "beautiful" as applied by the lecturer to London. Sir Walter says: "I intended this word to apply to her in right of her qualities of enterprise, courage, and tenacity, which she still possesses, I believe, as strongly as ever. . . . I was not thinking at all about the buildings of modern London." This is, of course, an answer. But the outward beauty of London is considerable; sometimes it is intoxicating. It resides not, indeed, in single buildings, but in their aggregation and irregularity, their broken sky lines, their multiplicity of details; above all, in the haze which hides and softens and dignifies masses.

IN a few days Messrs. Methuen will issue Capt. Sidney L. Hinde's work entitled The Fall of the Congo Arabs. The book deals with the recent Belgian Expedition to the Upper Congo, which developed into a war with the State forces and the Arab slave raiders in Central Africa. Two white men only returned alive from the three years' war—Commander Dhanis and Capt. Hinde.

The Edge of the Orient is the title of a book of travel in the East, which Messrs. Kegan Paul, Trench, Trübner & Co. will publish in the course of the next few days. The author is Mr. Robert Howard Russell, who has penetrated into many romantic spots not easily accessible to the tourist. The volume is illustrated from photographs, and contains views of the private surroundings of the Sultan of Turkey.

THE Antiquary for February will contain illustrated articles on "The Proposed Peterborough Cathedral Restoration"; "Ramblings of an Antiquary at Hardwick," by Mr. George Bailey; and "Gleanings from French Churches," by Miss Sophia Beale.

FOR the edition of Carlyle's Past and Present, which will be included in the "Nineteenth Century Classics," Mr. Frederic Harrison has written an introduction.

MESSRS. CONSTABLE & Co. are preparing a new edition of Sir Charles Dilke and Mr. Spencer Wilkinson's Imperial Defence.

THE BOOK MARKET.

DR. NANSEN'S BOOK.

THE imminent publication of Dr. Nansen's book Farthest North, in which the explorer relates in full his adventures during his late expedition in the Fram, is exciting great interest. The sensational sum which Messrs. Constable are understood to have paid for the copyright has contributed to this, and there is the interesting prospect of the work being published on the day, February 6, when Dr. Nansen makes his bow to the Royal Geographical Society. Nevertheless, the public has scarcely gained a complete notion of the magnitude of the undertaking. The thirty-five thousand two-volume copies of the book which will form the first English edition, and which will be sold at two guineas net, are only a small proportion of the total output of the book. There are to be editions for Norway, Germany, France, Italy, Holland, Sweden, Bohemia, and, of course, America. These, together with the English edition, will probably bring the total number of copies to 100,000, and this takes no account of any supplementary demand.

THE work is divisible into three sections, of which the first is taken up with Dr. Nansen's departure and the life of the whole party on the Fram previous to the great sledge journey; the second portion relates the adventures met with by Dr. Nansen in the fifteen months of toil and darkness during which he conducted his sledge party across the trackless and obstructed ice-fields. A single picturesque fact will indicate the interest of this section. Travelling at the rate of fifteen or twenty miles per day, the doctor and his little party were never sure that the vast ice-field over which they progressed with so much pain was not itself moving at the same rate backwards, thus nullifying the grand object of getting nearer to the Pole. The third section of the book is mainly occupied by the story of the Fram in the absence of the sledge party, for which the diaries of Captain Sverdrup furnished the material.

THE book will be thoroughly indexed. The illustrations, numbering about 250, have been selected from over 1,000 photographs taken on the expedition; some of these being reproduced from the negative and others requiring the attention of artists. There will also be sixteen original coloured illustrations from chalk drawings by Dr. Nansen. We understand that these most interesting drawings were in danger of being lost to the world owing to the small artistic value modestly set on them by Dr. Nansen. But having been permitted to see the reproductions we have no hesitation in pronouncing them highly interesting and instructive. They carry one more than any of the other illustrations to those desolate ice-fields, the home of the walrus, with their boreal lights and few sunsets. The maps will be five in number, and of these three have been made by Dr. Nansen. A fourth is Herr Julius Payer's map of Franz Josef Land of twenty years ago, which Dr. Nansen naturally wishes should be compared with his own, and the fifth is a map of the entire known polar region, made, we understand, with remarkable dispatch by Messrs. Bartholomew.

THE story of the actual writing of the book and its translation into English is interesting. Dr. Nansen has written his work at high pressure, amid every conceivable interruption from his friends and admirers, and from learned societies the world over; he has written it in Norwegian, and for the English edition six translators are responsible. Their renderings of Dr. Nansen's MS. have been revised by a well-known and accomplished student of Norwegian working in London. Dr. Nansen, we believe, found his sledge journey the most difficult part of his story to tell. His notes had necessarily to be carried continually on his person, with no advantage to their ultimate legibility. However, all these labours are now drawing to a close, and within a fortnight the two volumes will be in the booksellers' windows.

"BOUND BY ZAEHNSDORF."

A FEW days ago an interesting ceremony was carried out in the Jews' Free School, Spitalfields, under the chairmanship of Lord Rothschild. This was the presentation of an address in book form to Mr. Frederic D. Mocatta on the occasion of his seventieth birthday. The entire document, containing 8,000 signatures, was entrusted to Mr. Zaehnsdorf to bind. Many weeks of labour were expended on the volume, which is sumptuous to the last degree. It is in connexion with such events that the reading public hears or reads the name of Zaehnsdorf. "Bound by Zaehnsdorf" is one of the shibboleths of wealth.

Yet there is a delusion abroad which may be usefully knocked on the head. First, however, let it be remarked, in fairness, that the moral of this article may be, and doubtless is, applicable to other great firms of bookbinders. But the name of Zaehnsdorf heads the list of the craft in the estimation of all who are not over precious—for these the "Dove's Bindery"—and it was to Zaehnsdorf's that I went the other day to clear my ideas on inexpensive bookbinding.

For two hours of his precious time Mr. Zaehnsdorf pitted himself against my ignorance. What I have forgotten of all he told me and showed me would fill a book; what I remember will be sufficient for my purpose—which is to draw attention to the fact that great bookbinders who bind for rich men are also the best binders for comparatively poor men. Mr. Zaehnsdorf beamed when he saw my drift.

"It is my great difficulty," he said, "to get people to believe that we can and do bind books inexpensively."

"You mean, of course, in cloth?" I said, turning a doubtful gaze on the morocco and gold around.

"Yes; in cloth, in linen, or in buckram."

"And in what respects does your cloth-binding differ from the cloth-binding of books as ordinarily issued?"

"In this: ordinarily cloth-binding is case-binding. That we never touch. In case-binding the cover, or case, of a book, as you know, is made separately and then attached to the book merely by paper and glue. We re-bind thousands of such books in cloth, applying to them precisely the same constructive treatment as we do to our costliest leather-bound books. In this method the boards are laid upon the book itself and laced to it with hempen cord. The cloth covering is then passed round the whole, a leather label is fixed to the back, and you have a book which is as solid and, for practical lifetime purposes, as enduring as if it were in leather."

"And the cost?"

"The cost is small. Here is a complete set of Balzac's novels in octavo. We are binding them for a customer in Irish linen at two shillings a volume."

"Then a man who finds his favourite books getting infirm can bring them to you, choose his cloth according to his whim, and have them bound as solidly as the house of Zaehnsdorf knows how to bind a book, and at the price of two or three shillings a volume?"

"That is so, and we welcome such business."

I left the prince of bookbinders vowing that my Boswell, my Hazlitts, and my Jane Austens should renew their youth under his hands. They also shall be "bound by Zaehnsdorf."

SOME BOOKSELLERS' CATALOGUES.

OUR morning delivery of letters owes not a little of its bulk to secondhand booksellers' lists. It owes not a little of its interest to the same circumstances; and we shall occasionally jot down a few notes on the best catalogues which reach us. We comment on the following, selected from many that lie on our table:

MESSRS. EDWIN PARSONS & SONS (Brompton-road, S.W.).

MESSRS. PARSONS & SONS' catalogues are always distinguished by a number of important entries under the heads of Etchings, Engravings, and Drawings. In their present catalogue they offer a large collection of original sketches by J. M. W. Turner, Linnell, Hunt, Varley, &c.; including picturesque views on various parts of the Thames, with studies of the old wooden embankments, piers, landing-stages, coast scenes with shipping, rustic cottages, old sheds, studies of trees, old windmills, and a variety of other memoranda. Many of these sketches are named, and among them are to be found views of Bermondsey, Lambeth, Watford, Leatherhead, Millbank, Walworth, Edgeware-road, Brook-green, Chelsea, Twickenham, and Bayswater; in all there are sixty-eight original sketches from nature on grey and blue paper, mounted in a folio volume, and bound in half-russia. The price asked for this remarkable set of drawings is £200. Messrs. Parsons also offer the late Lord Leighton's copy (with his bookplate) of Goya's etchings, entitled "Los Desastres de la Guerra, coleccion de ochenta laminas inventadas y grabadas al agua fuerte." There are eighty etchings in the volume, depicting chiefly the horrors of civil war and revolution, executions, massacres, murders, &c. The price of this folio is £4 4s. Ackermann's Microcosm of London, with Rowlandson's coloured plates (£12 12s.); Chippendale's Gentleman's and Cabinet Maker's Director (£13 13s.); Havell's Views of the Thames, with twelve copies of his water-colour drawings printed in colours (£4 16s.), and other sumptuous works are in the list. A separate catalogue of mezzotint portraits includes a fine proof impression of Sir Thomas Laurence's Master Lambton; this is priced 30 guineas. For a fine proof before letters of Constable's Vale of Dedham, Messrs. Parsons ask 100 guineas—a price which every connoisseur knows is not excessive.

MR. E. MENKEN (Great Russell-street, W.C.).

Mr. Menken, who does business close to the British Museum, in a neighbourhood where learned bookmen abound, sends us a catalogue which includes many interesting items. The most unusual of these is perhaps a collection of American bronzes and engravings in celebration of the settlement of the American War of Secession. It contains fine medallion portraits of Washington, Abraham Lincoln, Ulysses S. Grant, and others. The whole is described as the only specimen that has been put on the English market, and is priced at 15 guineas. Mr. Menken also offers a complete and perfect copy of the Antiquities of Herculaneum and Pompeii (Le Antichità di Ercolano), published in Naples at £250, for 10 guineas. Glancing through other pages we note a copy of Richard Brathwaite's "The English Gentleman and Gentlewoman," with a Ladies' Love Lecture and a Supplement lately annexed, and entitled "The Turtle's Triumph" (1641), 18s. 6d.; "A Lyttel Parcel of Poems and Parodies in Prayers of Tobacco," containing divers conceited Ballades and Pithy Sayings, all newly collected and emprinted by W. Hamilton" (1889), 7s. 6d.; Cotton Mather's "Essays to Do Good," addressed to all Christians whether in Public or Private Capacities" (1807), 5s. 6d. The list is specially strong in books on ancient guilds and on London, those under the latter head including a copy of the Modern History of the City of London, by Mr. Charles Welch (Librarian to the Corporation). This work, quite recently issued, is out of print, only sufficient copies having been printed to supply the subscribers.

MESSRS. JAGGARD & Co. (Liverpool).

This firm's catalogue, bearing as its motto the Shakespearian quotation, "Here's the book I sought for so," is naturally rather rich in Lancashire books. We note Butterworth's History and Description of Ashton-under-Lyme (15s.), Pilkington's History of the Lancashire Family of Pilkington (£2 2s.), Roby's Traditions of Lancashire (4s.), and other local works. Messrs. Jaggard also offer a number of works on Freemasonry, and a quantity of Ruskiniana and Thackerayana. A copy of the "Breeches" Bible "Imprinted by the Deputies of Christopher Barker, 1595," folio, with quaint woodcuts, is offered at 30s.; and there is additional attraction in the fact that this volume belonged to a branch of Sir Isaac Newton's family. For £3 3s. the collector is also offered early editions of some of Goldsmith's work, described as follows: "The Deserted Village," 1775; "The Traveller," or, a Prospect of Society," 1770; "Retaliation, including Epitaphs on Distinguished Wits," 1774; first edition, vignette portrait, together 3 vols. in 1, 4to, cloth boards, rare, £3 3s."

MR. FRANK MURRAY (Nottingham).

Mr. Murray's catalogue is leavened with musical, occult, and medical books. Under the first heading we find something like 200 books listed; among them occurs the following entry, interesting not only to musicians, but to Johnsonian and eighteenth century students: "Burney (Dr. Charles) General History of Music, from the Earliest Ages to the Present Period, 1789, 4 vols., 4to, with fine portrait (mounted) and illustrations by Bartolozzi, &c., vol. iii., a little stained, half-morocco, gilt, scarce, £3 3s." This copy was bought at Sir John Goss's sale. Under occult we have a copy of Lilly's Astrology, 1647, small quarto, in old leather binding, offered at 12s. 6d. In the medical list occurs Gerard's Herbal, 1633, in folio, with many illustrations, in old rough calf binding, price £2 10s.

MR. GEORGE GREGORY (Bath).

Mr. Gregory's list is printed handsomely on quarto pages, and somehow suggests old Bath. We note "a unique set of Buffon" in 127 vols., in morocco binding, nearly contemporary with publication. This set is offered at £50. There is a fine old-world flavour about the following entry: "Gambado's Academy for Grown Horsemen," containing the completest instructions for walking, trotting, cantering, galloping, stumbling, and tumbling," with portrait and eleven other inimitable coloured caricature plates by Bunbury (London, Stockdale, 1812); also The Annals of Horsemanship, by Geoffrey Gambado, accidents and experimental accidents, successful and unsuccessful, communicated by his various correspondents, and now first published, with 17 splendid coloured caricatures by H. Bunbury, first edition, 1812, 4to, original paper boards, with printed labels on sides, on which the prices of each volume are stated as "plain, 21s.; coloured, 42s.," the 2 vols. in immaculate, clean, and perfect condition, price £10." Mr. Gregory offers a very large stock of bound volumes of magazines, reviews, and periodicals.

MESSRS. DRAYTON & SONS (Exeter).

This West country firm issues a neat catalogue of twenty pages containing not a few interesting items. Works on Devonshire and Cornwall fill one page, and include Gribble's Memorials of Barnstaple (7s. 6d.); Carew's Survey of Cornwall and An Epistle Concerning the Excellences of the English Tongue, quarto, 1732 (7s. 6d.); and Wright's West Country Poets (10s. 6d.). The general contents of this catalogue are very varied. We notice Howitt's Rural Life of England and Rural and Domestic Life of Germany, with some woodcuts by Bewick, in two 8vo vols., price 15s. A complete set of William Hume's works, comprising the Every-Day Book (2 vols.), Year Book, and Table Book are temptingly offered by Messrs. Drayton at 16s. The prices in this catalogue strike us as particularly low throughout.

MR. HORACE G. COMMEN (Bournemouth).

From sea-side, pine-scented Bournemouth comes a list in which standard works and library editions are conspicuous. The eight published volumes of Peppys's Diary, edited by Mr. Henry B. Wheatley, are offered, in the uncut library edition, at six guineas, this price including the ninth volume when it appears. For the same price Prescott's complete works are offered in sixteen volumes, with 192 full-page plates, of which many are on Japanese paper. Strickland's Lives of the Queens of England, in twelve volumes (1845); the Letters of Mary, Queen of Scots, in two volumes (1845); and the Lives of the Queens of Scotland and the English Princesses are offered by Mr. Commen at £4 7s. 6d. The high premium which is now placed on back numbers of The Studio is illustrated by the following entry: "The Studio: An Illustrated Magazine of Fine and Applied Art, from its commencement to September, 1896, fully illustrated throughout, 8 vols., imp. 8vo, in the original numbers as issued, with title-pages and indexes complete, very scarce, £6 15s. 1893-6." Here is an item with a fine old crusted flavour: "Reynolds (Richard). A Chronicle of all the Noble Emperours of the Romaines, from Julius Cæsar, orderly to this most victorious Emperour Maximilian, that now governeth, with the Great Warres of Julius Cæsar and Pompeius Magnus, setting forth the Great Power and Divine Providence of Almighty God in preserving the Godly Princes and Common wealthes." Black Letter, engraved title-page, and numerous rude woodcut portraits, small 4to, polished calf, gilt. Rare, £2 10s. "Imprinted at London, in Fletestreate, neare to Saint Dunstone's Church, by Thomas Marshe—Anno Domini, 1571." First and only edition of this curious and scarce book. The Townley copy sold for £4 14s. 6d.

NEW BOOKS RECEIVED.

ONE of the most interesting books of the week is Messrs. George Bell & Sons' reprint of the Early Essays of John Stuart Mill. The editor, Mr. J. W. M. Gibbs, gives the history of the articles in a preface. Such of these essays as have appeared in book form before are out of print; others appear in a volume for the first time. Mr. Gibbs justly remarks that of all these essays "the two that will probably have most general interest are the reviews of Tennyson's Poems and Carlyle's French Revolution." Indeed, the middle section of the book containing, besides these essays, the two entitled "What is Poetry?" and "The Two Kinds of Poetry," may be considered the cream of the book on a first uncritical glance.

Another important arrival is the fourth, and final, volume of The Life and Works of Robert Burns, edited by Robert Chambers, and re-edited by William Wallace (W. & R. Chambers). The volume is larger than any one of its predecessors. Mr. Wallace makes his bow and tenders his thanks to all who have helped him in this enterprise. "No effort," Mr. Wallace says, "has been spared to make the Indexes at once exhaustive and convenient for purposes of reference."

In fiction we have a novel by Mr. G. S. Street, called The Wise and the Wayward (John Lane), and Madge o' the Pool, and Other Tales, by William Sharp (Constable). The "Pool" is the Thames Pool. Mr. Sharp may be presumed to have studied the Pool life at those close quarters which are demanded now of a story writer. Opening the book at a venture, we read: "Many of the Poolites haunt holes and corners in the neighbourhood of Horsleydown Stairs. Some have their lair in old boats, or among rotten sheds or wood piles; others are as homeless and as unpleasant and as fierce as dung-beetles."

Other books whose titles at once excite interest are Essays, by the late George John Romanes (George Bell & Sons); History in Fact and Fiction, by the Hon. Albert S. G. Canning (Smith, Elder); On the Nile with a Camera, by Anthony Watkin (T. Fisher Unwin); and The Ruined Cities of Ceylon, by Henry W. Cane (Sampson, Low).

AN IMPRESSION.

LYME REGIS would hardly have lived in literature but that one of Miss Austen's heroines sprained her ankle there, jumping off the Cobb. They were not athletic, those young ladies who had the felicity to become our great-grandmothers. Yet you shall not pass through the streets of the little town, under its mimic Guildhall and along its toy harbour, without the authentic thrill of Elizabethan poetry. It is of that jolly seaboard where dwelt the buccaneers who whipped the Armada. To reach it you must pass Sherborne Castle, which Raleigh once held, and which became the booty of some court parasite at his disaster. At this day these coasts of Devon and of Dorset have a half foreign look about them, as if here for once England learned to be less insular, and held forth friendly hands to other countries across the main. Who was the boy with black eyes and olive skin who looked out just now from yonder cottage window? Was it that some three centuries ago a Spanish prisoner lost his heart to a maid beneath a hedge of Devon, wild-rose-hung. Or was it a Devon sailor who brought back the silent Spanish wife to share his home with green paroquets and ivory and quaint sea-spoils? And down in the market-place this morning there was a Breton peasant, in his blue blouse, and with his broken speech, trying to sell the strings of golden onions that dangled from his stick. What comings and goings these quiet inlets have seen, since first the strange prow of the Phoenician traders broke into the unknown seas. And whither shall we sail then, in what galleon and to what port? Yester-eve, just as the sun went down, a quite new world broke into sight, a mysterious headland, darkly outlined against the background of crimson flame. The fishermen told us it was Berry Head, away beyond Torquay. But I will swear it was the Hesperides.

PARIS LETTER.

(From our French Correspondent.)

M. MARCEL PRÉVOST's new book, Le Jardin Secret, is not only poetically, but most felicitously named. Though the novel runs on the eternal theme, adultery, with its basenesses, its inevitable shocks and deceptions, the book is a strikingly original, pondered, and grave one. The objectionable flavour of M. Prévost's other novels is eliminated, and here he gives us a profound interior drama told in the first person, without shady scenes or suggestive details. It is at once closer and broader work than anything else the author has done. Certainly these modern Frenchmen, from M. Bourget down, have made the most astonishing, strenuous, and subtle study of feminine character, and that elusive organ the feminine Parisian heart. Just or untrue, M. Prévost in the line he has chosen is unsurpassed. What sorry dolls, what unintelligent, unrevealed entities, the women of our own English novelists, excepting those of George Eliot and Mr. Meredith, seem besides the least interesting, the least studied of these French women in modern fiction. It is impossible to name a single recent novel in England that approaches such a book as Le Jardin Secret in intellectual and psychological value.

The style is clear and strong; without charm, however, but admirably adapted to the subject. The confession and self-revealings are those of a comfortable bourgeoisie, who, wearied of the colourless life of a teacher, and jilted by a pupil's cousin, marries for a home and a place in the social system. The diary which leads us into her soul's secret garden opens with the event of her husband's departure in quest of a provincial inheritance. The disquietude that follows a disturbed routine, and the fragmentary working of a brain long unused to solitude and thought, make a seizing start, and while painting the woman as she is, evoke the violent and ambitious young girl she has replaced with a surety of touch no less remarkable than real. It is ruthless, a little brutal, as might be expected from the author of Demi-Vierges.

In her husband's absence, through his keys forgotten in his drawers, she discovers his duplicity and infidelities, and this leads to her employment of the secret inquiry office and half-formed project of divorce. Here is the great point in a sober and masterly study of a complex character, and a vulgar situation dignified and enlarged by accurate and profound observation, by original and momentous analysis, by a fineness of perception, a subtlety, and an honesty, a directness of treatment that only a French artist seems capable of.

Consideration of so desperate a step as divorce for the bourgeoisie, who clings by temperament as well as taste to home and habits, forces Marthe to look deep down into her own conscience and bring up to light every tarnished memory, every unavowable impulse and desire. Such an examination of conscience as she so severely submits herself to requires an intelligence no less unusual than a deliberateness of purpose and mind. Remembrance is apt to be so fragmentary and inconclusive, and the most honest person in the world is scared by a positive confrontation with past error and small frailties. Not so this extremely intelligent and sincere bourgeoisie. The passionate crisis of her girlhood and the kisses of her betrothed, concealed from her husband, are evoked as attenuating evidences in favour of his duplicity. If he has his secret garden—more vulgarly planted than hers—she, too, has her secretive corner, into which he cannot penetrate. All his concealments and lies are duplicated by hers. Besides his epileptic uncle there is her father, charged with embezzlement, both facts scrupulously concealed on either side. Against his mistresses she places her flirtations; and M. Prévost makes no secret here, as well as elsewhere, of his violent prejudice against a form of amusement borrowed from foreign races. Flirtation he frankly calls a vice, comprised of coquetry, evil desire, and the need of a little inconsequent romance in daily life—"a sentimental intoxication"; and further on, more fiercely still, in an admirable untranslatable phrase one would wish all silly girls who regard flirtation as an innocent and genial pastime between the sexes to study and fully understand: "Le frémissement de l'impur effleuré, respiré," so falsely decorated with pretty and sentimental names by our own more indulgent and less honest novelists.

Looking round her room, and picking out familiar objects, she ends her long and solid argument against divorce, which means disorder, broken home, and injured child:

"To a stranger it may be ugly and worthless, but for me it is priceless. I love it ardently, because I dreamed a moment of dispersing and destroying it. All that means home, and I will not break up my home. . . . I abandon retaliation, I accept destiny. I have touched the bottom of the abyss, conscience, and risen again to the surface. I have found therein, relatively, the same weaknesses and secrets that shocked me in my husband."

Beneath these daily lies of double life she finds something else besides selfishness: human mercifulness, a sort of humble charity. The ideal of marriage transcends the moral infirmity of mankind:

"Parasite herbs or poisonous plants, what wife, what husband has not a 'secret garden' into which the other never penetrates, into which he must not penetrate under pain of destroying the home?"

Such is the conclusion of this remarkable study, rather than novel. Not a noble one, perhaps, but founded on solid sense.

NEW YORK LETTER.

(From our American Correspondent.)

THE great boom of Marie Corelli is probably of more astounding proportions in America than in her native land, for her denunciations of the critical craft do not include our newspaper reviewers, who are on the whole an unexact and appreciative brood, and have welcomed Miss Corelli with serious praise or mild chaff. There are no satirical papers here to break an author's heart. The publishers have the most respectful regard for Miss Corelli, for she makes more than the fleeting fame of the season—she makes money. We must have had half-a-dozen novels from Miss Corelli during 1896.

A good deal of curiosity has been awakened in literary circles here over a little volume, entitled Lyrics of the Lowly, published by Dodd, Mead & Co. The author, Mr. Paul Lawrence Dunbar, is the pioneer poet of the African Americans. In his veins flows the purest and bluest of black blood. This is all the more surprising, as the complacent white race has always held to the theory that the negroes are degenerating in civilisation, and the only chance of any development of the higher faculties will come from the admixture of blood, which is so common a feature of life in the slums of the Northern cities; but Mr. Dunbar is a full-blooded negro. His father and mother were both slaves, but were afterwards freed by the events of the Civil War. Although the poet himself was born free, he was born under all the disadvantages of his race, in poverty, and under the cloud of prejudice, which is almost as strong to-day in the North as before the war. The father had a strong love for reading and music, and his mother a passion for poetry, the germ of which she no doubt transmitted to her son. This fact alone is significant, and strengthens a belief in some latent powers and faculties in the negro race, hitherto only developed in the military qualities of such rare men as Touissant L'Ouverture. The development of the intellectual life of our dark-hued brethren might prove a distinct gain to American literature. Perhaps America's ultimate claims in literature will have to rest on the diversity of distinctive traits of the peculiar and varied peoples of the country, modified by a new social life, political life, and climate.

SOME of Mr. Dunbar's poems are written in dialect form. These are generally considered to be in his happiest vein. But I am somewhat more impressed by his more serious poems. These show that the poet possesses not only a pretty fancy and delicacy of sentiment, but also that he is capable of a certain depth and intensity of thought. Some of the lines are suggestive, and show much simple strength. A light spirit of optimism pervades his work. It is not offensively optimistic, however, as the lines mostly include a minor note of melancholy. At present Mr. Dunbar is barred out of all the higher occupations by reason of race prejudice; and he dreams his poems as he runs an elevator (lift, as you English call it) in an office-building in Atlanta, Ga. In some more congenial atmosphere he might sing the inner spiritual life of his race, which only wants utterance to arouse other dormant intellects among his own brethren.

MESSRS. COPELAND & DAY have done a commendable as well as unusual thing in this country, where anything not fiction is looked askance at by publishers, in the publishing of two dainty little volumes of essays. This is a form of literature completely out of vogue in America, unless the contemporary revival in England is to carry any influence here. The venture is made under the twin-title of The Listener in Town and The Listener in the Country. The writer of these essays is Mr. Joseph Edgar Chamberlin, and the papers first appeared under the title of "The Listener" in the Boston Transcript daily through a term of years. This column of light and distinctly literary essays and comments is one which is more literary and old-fashioned in its taste than anything appearing in the columns of papers in New York or the West. It is one of the literary institutions of Boston. Eugene Field in the Chicago Record was the only parallel. The fact that these airy essays first appeared in a newspaper in this country makes it all the more unusual, as only the most ephemeral and sensational writing is generally admitted into the newspapers here. But the Transcript is one of the very few papers in America which have remained at all steadfast to the earlier traditions of English models, before sensational journalism broke into the excess of license. It is greatly respected in Boston, because it admits some measure of purely literary work to its columns, and is always dignified and judicious.

THE Chap Book has changed its form and character, to the astonishment of everybody interested in the tide of contemporary doings. It has given up the pamphlet size and form and takes on the proportions and the character of the English weekly reviews—it will be a compromise between the form of the ACADEMY and other contemporary reviews. The editor's aim is to establish, what has been long talked about and discussed, and has never yet seemed a feasible venture here, a review of the first class. It will give ample space to notices of all important publications in travel, history, and belles-lettres. In addition, it will print stories, poems, and essays as before, and the illustrations will be limited to portraits and pictures of literary interest and purely decorative designs. The intention is to subject contemporary writing to the highest literary standards. This is distinctly a new and important attitude in American criticism.

SCIENCE.

I AM not one of those who consider that the British nation should solemnly sit down and take lessons from every country that is doing scientific work, but I admire—and I suppose most people who know anything about it admire—the organised Government institutions for the promotion of science in America. They are eminently practical in their scope. They deal with such things as agriculture, hydrography, navigation, fisheries, land surveys, fruit-culture, and so on, while even such departments as the geological, the zoological, and the entomological are directed not so much towards the formation of museums or the increase of knowledge, as towards the compiling of reports on the most suitable lands for certain crops, the areas within which useful beasts are found, and the means whereby every manner of noxious "bug" may be circumvented in its attacks upon vegetation. The origin, constitution, work, and more especially the shortcomings of this great organised system of "Bureaus," have recently been dealt with in an American journal, from which the following particulars are extracted.

It seems that the organisation under which this great series of investigations has been conducted is more apparent than real. The scientific work of the Government is carried on by a number of agencies scattered through the various departments, often without much logical relation to the other work they perform. Thus the Coast Survey, the Navigation Commission, the Marine Hospital Service, and the Life Saving Service are under the direction of the Treasury, while the Navy Department controls the National Observatory (as is the case here) and the Hydrographic Office. Distributed in this haphazard fashion, organised under broad and often indefinite laws, it not infrequently happens that two or more scientific bodies clash in respect of their functions. As a specimen of excessive duplication, it may be mentioned that there are four hydrographic offices situated under the control of as many different departments. There are also three separate and distinct agencies for measuring land—or, as the patriarchal phraseology of the Republic puts it, attending to the survey, sale, classification, and protection of the lands of the national domain. In this connexion, also, we begin to understand how it happens that so many excellent reports have appeared on the lake and river formation, watersheds, and soundings of America, when we read that “four or five agencies (including the Fish Commission and the Army Engineer Corps) have been engaged in making measurements and studies in the navigable rivers and great lakes during the last few years.”

An explanation of this curious state of things is found in the system under which most of these active and intelligent organisations arose. “Some Government official became deeply interested in a certain line of work bearing upon the development of the country, and after agitating the matter for several years he finally secured an appropriation from Congress authorising the investigation to be made in the department with which he was connected. Either the originator or some other friend of the scheme was put in charge of the work, and if it proved beneficial it received increased appropriations from year to year.” The result is, that a network of agencies, employing over 5,000 persons exclusive of those occupied on the census, has grown up, and is annually dispensing some eight millions of dollars. The writer from whom I have been quoting (Science, January 15) unfolds an elaborate scheme for consolidating and unifying all these agencies under one scientific department. Could such a scheme be carried through, there is little reason to doubt that the Government scientific work would be even more efficiently performed, and that all countries, our own included, would be benefited by being able to obtain from one definite source a series of admirable reports on almost every subject dealing with the vast mineral resources, products, geographical formations, and climatic peculiarities of the North American continent.

The faculty of constructing generalisations out of imperfect data is not confined to France, though it flourishes there in a peculiarly healthy manner. An instance which has recently come under my notice is a paper on vegetarianism by a certain M. Verrier, read before the Société d’Ethnographie. M. Verrier had a doubly gratifying task, for he not only undertook to prove on very inadequate grounds that vegetarianism corrupted the physical and moral qualities of nations, but was able as well to rub in a few Anglophobic sentiments to illustrate his theory. Thus the easy conquest of India by British arms he attributed to an unwholesome abstinence from meat diet on the part of religious Hindoos, and the suppression (?) of the Irish was put down no less to an exclusive affection for potatoes. As for the Japanese, who notoriously batted upon rice down to a comparatively recent date, their sudden activity in the East was a crowning proof of M. Verrier’s remarkable doctrine, for it coincided in point of date with the establishment of a meat trade in the Japanese archipelago.

SIR MARTIN CONWAY’S paper on “The First Crossing of Spitzbergen” met, as might be expected, with a warm reception at the Royal Geographical Society last Tuesday. Before leaving home, Sir Martin said, he had read everything he could find relating to the observation of previous explorers, and the only result was that he found the interior of the country to be utterly different from all the ideas he had formed. Instead of a series of boggy coast valleys with an icy interior, they were confronted by an intricate and much intersected mountain region. The paper was taken up with a detailed account of the adventures and wanderings undergone by the party, and by graphic descriptions of the scenery in Sir Martin Conway’s own masterly manner. Photographic slides by Mr. Garwood and other members of the expedition illustrated the lecture. The next big item on the Royal Geographical Society’s programme is, of course, the Nansen address, for which, as I believe I have previously mentioned, the Albert Hall has been secured. The last time the Society indulged in this expansion was when it welcomed Mr. Stanley back from the futile Emin expedition, but even then there was nothing like the rush for seats that there has been to hear Nansen.

THE celebration of M. Hervé Faye’s jubilee as member of the French Academy of Sciences was a pleasant tribute to a wonderful old man. M. Faye bears his eighty-three years very lightly, and does not give the impression of one whose astronomical training was gained under Arago. In 1843 he discovered the septennial comet which bears his name, and to which mainly he owed his early election into the great scientific body of France. An interesting story is told of his efforts to escape public life, until Marshal McMahon finally compelled him to become an official candidate for Passy, and shortly after his election forced upon him the portfolio of Public Instruction. This backsliding was the object of a hostile demonstration on the part of M. Faye’s students at the Ecole Polytechnique, who, however, altered their tone to uproarious applause when the new Minister naïvely assured them that it was his intention to resign at the earliest opportunity. M. Faye was made a grand officer of the Legion of Honour in 1889, and now he has had the Grand Cross presented to him. He is the author of numerous astronomical works, including a treatise on the “Origin of the World.”

PROBABLY few people expected to hear much that was new on the subject of liquid oxygen at the first Friday evening discourse of this session at the Royal Institution. For the rest, Prof. Dewar contrived an agreeable disappointment. Among the more interesting additions made to our knowledge of this fascinating fluid are the facts that its temperature is so invariable as to afford a standard, and that its optical and magnetic properties remain unchanged in the gaseous, liquid, and, probably, also the solid condition. An ingenious proof of the exact temperature of its boiling point was afforded by inserting a thermo-electric couple into a liquid boiling at +182° C., and another into the oxygen boiling at a supposed temperature of -182° C. The balancing of the resulting currents shows that the latter figure is correct.

PROF. DEWAR performed a pretty experiment, which is worth recording here, to show what depth of liquid was represented by our gaseous atmosphere. The air, as we know, extends upwards all round the globe to a distance of about five miles. Prof. Dewar had a tube fifty-two feet long hanging from the top of the building, in which was ordinary air. This represented about one five-hundredth of the height of the atmosphere. When the air in the tube was liquefied it collected at the bottom to a depth of about four-fifths of an inch. This multiplied by 500 will give the depth of the sea of liquid air in which we should be immersed if the earth became suddenly reduced to the temperature of interstellar space.

PROF. DEWAR gave an interesting account of the optical properties of oxygen, and of its effect at sunset and sunrise upon the lines of the solar spectrum. In this connexion it is amusing to recall a famous speech of Lord Salisbury’s at the British Association meeting of 1894, wherein his lordship argued that the stellar bodies could not all have a common origin, as was asserted, because neither oxygen nor nitrogen was revealed by the spectroscope in the constituents of the sun. The point of the contention on the part of a Churchman of the old school is obvious; but unluckily there is a very simple reason for the absence of lines showing these bodies. When the mixed vapour of metals and non-metallic elements are examined together in the spectroscope, it is a known fact that the latter are always overcome by the former. Silicon and carbon are the only bodies of the metalloid class which are strong enough to assert themselves in the solar spectrum. I am partially indebted for this instance to somebody whose book I have recently read. Who it is, I have forgotten.

MUSIC.

THE performance of "Die Meistersinger" at the Garrick Theatre last Friday week was an event of considerable importance. The Carl Rosa Company has given Wagner's opera in the provinces for some time, but a London performance is a kind of hall-mark. It is easy, and moreover true, to say that operas are heard to best advantage in the language in which they were set by composers—French in French, German in German, and so on—that is, if the audience understand whatever language is being sung; otherwise a fair translation will give far more satisfaction. Education and travel have certainly increased the number of English who read and understand German; but there are still thousands who have not enjoyed similar opportunities; and to these, such performances of Wagner in English are certainly welcome.

THE stage of the Garrick Theatre is not large enough for the trial-scene of the first act, the street fight of the second, or the processions of the third, or, as it is called, fourth act. David's order to the 'prentices to "make smaller the stage" for the "Trial" had indeed in it a touch of irony. The stage manager, however, deserves all possible praise for the display he was able to effect within such limited space. Then, again, the orchestra was not large enough to render proper justice to Wagner's music; but here, again, the conductor, Herr Eckhold, achieved excellent results with the means at his command. Every excuse had to be made for a man who entered thoroughly into the meaning of the music; and the spirit in which he worked made amends for whatever was lacking in the letter.

THERE were cuts which in a work of this kind are always of bad effect, for they interfere with the composer's intentions, which ought always to be respected. Even great composers, however, often merely followed custom, or yielded to wishes prompted by the vanity of vocalists; in such cases there were no proper intentions, and a cut here and there did no harm, sometimes, indeed, good. Wagner, by the length of his works, has sorely tried the patience of managers, especially here in England, where the hour of commencement is so late. In Germany they open much earlier, and the same will have to be done here if Wagner is ever to be properly understood and appreciated. His works do not appear long when given in full, and under proper conditions. Cuts in most cases make them actually appear longer; for they break the continuity of the story, and thereby the continuity of interest of attentive listeners.

THE motive for cutting, however mistaken, is now, as a rule, a good one. Years ago—in the so-called good olden times—it was otherwise. When Mozart's "Don Juan" was produced in London in 1817 it was announced that the opera would be "much abridged," to make room for the ballet, a necessary part of the evening's "entertainment." But it should be noted that in the book of words printed for that production of Mozart's masterpiece the lines omitted were carefully marked with inverted commas. Modern managers, so long as they feel cutting to be necessary, might well imitate so excellent an example.

Of the performers in the "Mastersingers," to give it its English title, I would mention Mr. Hedmond (Walther), Mr. Ludwig (Sachs), Mr. H. Lind (Beckmesser), and Mr. F. Wood (David), who entered thoroughly into the spirit of their respective rôles. Miss A. Esty as Eva was fairly satisfactory; she was not able to realise all her good intentions. The rendering of the difficult Beckmesser part by Mr. H. Lind really deserves note. The pedant in the play is serious enough, serious in his love, in his vanity, and in his ambition, but he causes laughter in others. I will not say that the actor never exaggerated, never tried to raise a laugh, but there was very little indeed to complain of. The whole company—actors and chorus—deserve praise for the heartiness and ensemble of their acting; no one seemed to be working for his own glory, but for the total effect of the piece. That the Carl Rosa company attempted such a difficult and complex work at all redounds to their credit. They did not come to London to show us how Wagner's opera should be given, but how a travelling company could manage to give it in the provinces; and they deserved and have obtained a favourable verdict.

MME. TERESINA TUA (Comtesse de Franchi-Verney) gave a violin recital at St. James's Hall on Monday afternoon. As a girl she made her first appearance here in 1889, and showed good promise of becoming an accomplished artist; and that promise has been fulfilled. Her performance of the violin part of Brahms' Sonata in A (Op. 100) was most refined and artistic; the pianoforte part was sympathetically interpreted by Mrs. Fanny Davies. Mme. Tua also performed Mendelssohn's violin concerto in most able manner. Her playing showed the influence of Joachim, while in the speed at which she took the Finale, also in one or two little mannerisms, she reminded me of Sarasate. The programme included solos for violin and for pianoforte. It was altogether a most pleasant concert.

BEETHOVEN's pianoforte Sonata in B flat (Op. 106) is not often performed, and for this there are two good reasons: it is very long and very difficult. M. Eugen d'Albert certainly played it two seasons ago, but, to the best of my remembrance, it had not, until then, been heard in London for many years; the last performance at the Popular Concerts—according to Mr. Chappell's catalogue—was as far back as 1869. Mr. Frederic Lamond gave it at his second pianoforte recital on Tuesday afternoon. His technique was excellent, and in each movement he displayed intellectual gifts of a high order. The emotional element was not lacking; and yet there were moments in which more warmth and tenderness would have been acceptable. The reading of the wonderful Adagio was Mr. Lamond's finest effort. While he was playing this long though never tedious movement, my thoughts turned back to another of the master's slow movements, namely the Largo in D minor of the Sonata in D (Op. 10, No. 3). Between the two there is deep affinity; they are both pre-eminently sad, though in each there are rays, however mild, of hope and consolation. But in the later music there is greater intensity and sublimity; and as in the thoughts and feelings, so is there a corresponding change in the mode by which they are expressed. In the Largo Beethoven confides his sorrows to the household instrument; in the Adagio the pianoforte seems to have almost the colour and life of an orchestra; and yet the writing is perfectly legitimate.

THE concluding Fugue, interpreted, by the way, with rare skill and vigour, is an extraordinary composition; it is bold, learned, and, to pianists, most interesting, though not on the same inspired level as the three preceding movements. When the Sonata first appeared in London it was published in two separate parts: the first ended with the Scherzo played after the Adagio; the second consisted of the short Largo followed by the Fugue. And this was done with Beethoven's consent. Why, then, should these parts not sometimes be played thus separately? The Sonata, as I have said, is very long. An attempt is occasionally made to shorten it—as on the present occasion—by omitting the repeat in the opening Allegro. This, however, in my opinion, is detrimental to the movement, and, after all, only about five minutes are saved.

MR. LAMOND played a group of short solos. Field's naïve and graceful Nocturne in A was delightfully rendered. Chopin's "Barcarolle" in F sharp and "Polonaise" in A flat were in many ways excellent, and yet the full poetry of the music was not revealed. As compared, however, with the C minor Nocturne at the first recital there was a great improvement.

THE present moment is one specially fitted to render honour to Schubert, and Mr. Lamond might well have included one of the Sonatas or the "Wanderer" Fantasia in his programmes. Instead of this he presents the master's music touched up—I ought to say spoilt—by Liszt and Tausig. On Tuesday he played the Schubert-Liszt Mélodie Hongroise, a lovely theme followed by vulgar virtuosic variations. Liszt seems to have been a genuine admirer of Schubert's music, but his way of showing his admiration for the master was, to put it mildly, peculiar. And not only Schubert, but Weber, Chopin, and, if Berlioz may be trusted, also Beethoven suffered at his hands. Liszt's good and great deeds atone, to some extent, for these transgressions, but why need pianists perpetuate them?

A FORTNIGHT ago I named Ferdinand Schubert as responsible for the orchestration of the Schubert's pianoforte part of the "Song of Miriam." I ought to have said Franz Lachner. J. S. S.

CORRESPONDENCE.

DISCOUNT v. NET SYSTEM.

London: Jan. 25.

I am glad to learn that Mr. Edward Arnold has decided to abandon the net-price system in the case of school-books. We should feel especially gratified at this step, for some of the best educational publications in the market are to be found among those issued by his house, notably the British Classics and Shakespeare Series, edited by Mr. Churton Collins. Several of the Shakespeare plays, indeed—the “Lear,” “Hamlet,” “Richard III.,” and “King John”—contain much fresh and original work. It is within my certain knowledge that a very large proportion of head masters practically boycott the publications of those firms which adhere to the recently instituted net-system, and as Messrs. Macmillan & Co., Longmans, Bell, and the two University Presses continue to recognise the claims of immemorial usage and to publish school-books on the time-honoured discount principle, it is easy enough to do so. The fact is, that in the great majority of schools the book supply is regarded as a regular, and by no means contemptible, source of income. Whether the custom is immoral or not is a delicate question in ethics which I do not feel disposed to discuss, because that is no concern of the publisher. For a few publishers to enter upon a crusade against the practice may be magnificent, but it is not business; and even though all existing publishers of educational works were to unite in such a movement, the only result would be that an excellent opening would be offered for new houses to start on the discount terms that have been so long recognised. The shame of the practice, if any shame there be, lies at the door, not of the school-master, but of the country which permits the financial position of a very large number of its schools to be so precarious that those who conduct them have to utilise every possible avenue of profit in order to make ends meet.

SCHOOLMASTER.

LEIGH HUNT.

Bebington: Jan. 19.

Probably I am not the only reader of the ACADEMY who regretted that your article on the “Academy Picture” last week was so serious a Depreciation of Leigh Hunt. The writer has surely done him less than justice. He calls him superficial. On a superficial acquaintance he may appear so, and there are one or two significant omissions from the article which lead me to think your contributor has not given him any close attention—probably not thinking he was worth it. For instance, the Leigh Hunt of the Examiner—who was imprisoned because he had the courage of his convictions—is not so much as named. Again, Hunt’s high-water mark as a poet is said to be indicated by a pretty bit of verse, which your contributor, justly enough, terms a “trifle,” while the one real poem Hunt wrote—“Abouben Adhem”—is not named. One of whom it can be said “his critical faculty was sound, and, although he could not make great and beautiful things himself, he was the first to point to the beautiful things of others,” could not have been utterly superficial. “The Religion of the Heart” is not only not superficial, but serves to refute the statement that he could not make beautiful things himself. Those who study Leigh Hunt and his writings find that, just as his light and airy manner covered a pure and sterling character, so his equally light and airy literary touch clothed solid wisdom. Leigh Hunt’s “capital,” says your contributor, consisted of “a sunny, optimistic temperament, a charming fancy, and a quick discernment of excellence.” This is much, but if it were all, seeing his work was chiefly journalistic, however popular it might have been in its own day, it must have been forgotten before now. Yet Leigh Hunt’s fame as a man of letters grows rather than vanishes. His “capital” included not only an exquisite literary style, but what is more important—clear insight, scholarship, and truthfulness. I venture to say that, however trivial his subject, Leigh Hunt himself, in the way he treats it, is never utterly trivial. He refreshes the mind. He stimulates thought. He refines and ennobles. If his books were such as your contributor thinks, one reading of them would suffice; but they gain on re-reading. Carlyle, who was hard to please, saw in Leigh Hunt “a man of most indisputably superior worth; a man of genius in a very strict sense of that word, and in all the senses which it bears and implies; of brilliant, varied gifts, of clearness, lovingness, truthfulness; of child-like, open character.”

I am sorry the ACADEMY, at this late day, has renewed the cruel slander which links Leigh Hunt with Harold Skimpole. Dickens himself protested emphatically against the suggestion of their identity, and the exact truth of the case has been stated by John Forster. The whimsical manner of Skimpole was drawn from Leigh Hunt—nothing more. There the resemblance ends, absolutely and finally. It insults Dickens’s literary ability, as well as Hunt’s memory, to suggest anything else. The keeping of the diary was drawn from Haydon. Leigh Hunt was strenuous, hardworking, sincere, honourable. He was Dickens’s own intimate friend; and Dickens, of all men, could never have held friendship with such an ungrateful and treacherous hypocrite as Harold Skimpole. In these days persons of the Skimpole type are pleasantly forgiven because of the peculiarities of their “artistic temperament”; but Dickens was a man who always gave hypocrisy its true name.

The misfortune is, that no sufficient biography of Leigh Hunt has ever been produced. I always thought my friend, the late James Ashcroft Noble, should have written it. His temperament and gifts were akin in many ways to those of Hunt, and peculiarly fitted him for the task. More than once I urged it upon him, and believe he was disposed to attempt it. Alas! it had to be postponed to the urgent calls of the hour, and now it is too late. He has, however, left us, in The Sonnet in England and Other Essays, one of the best brief studies of Leigh Hunt which has yet appeared.

WALTER LEWIN.

BOOK REVIEWS REVIEWED.

The Laureate’s “Conversion of Winckelmann, and other Poems.” (Macmillan.)

“A CLEVER piece of Brown-ingesque execution,” the Spectator pronounces, “but not a poem in which it is possible to take great pleasure . . . ; a clever tour de force, though it has but little of Mr. Browning’s curt and very rough-shod genius. . . . Mr. Austin is more himself in his rural studies. Some parts of the translation of the second Georgic are delicate and happy. . . . Perhaps the most taking poem in the volume is . . . ‘The Silent Muse.’” “Was ever versifier so vain as this one?” the Pall Mall passionately demands, apropos of this very poem. “. . . Really this attitude of regarding himself as ‘a serious poet’ . . . is too ridiculous to pass.” But “his Muse, if entirely pedestrian, is not always inept.” “Winckelmann seems to the critic ‘unreal as a picture of a mental struggle, . . . but there is some appreciation of artistic or archaeological feeling in it. . . . With every wish to be polite, we cannot affect to regard the book as a serious contribution—even to contemporary poetry.” “The strength of the verse” in “Winckelmann,” says the Daily News, “is the more remarkable that it is unwonted. . . . It is impossible to affect ignorance as to the source of his new power.” But “in official verse Mr. Austin succeeds no better than those who have gone before him.” In the handling of the Winckelmann theme the Standard declares that the writer has displayed “the instinct of a perfect craftsman. . . . In the finer qualities of thought and feeling the volume will commend itself to the favour of lovers of English verse.”

“Monologues of the Dead.” By
G. W. Stevens.
(Methuen.)

THE idea of taking a character from antiquity, such as Cicero or Caligula or Themistocles, and imagining him to soliloquise, usually at the moment of his death or in some violent crisis, the St. James’s Gazette can imagine to have been possible “for Landor or Renan. But Mr. Stevens has approached a task wholly beyond his powers. . . . That he knows his classics is apparent, but learning is not sufficient to give vitality to a conception;” and, lest he should seem dull, “he seasons his pages with astounding vulgarisms. We are ready sometimes to fancy that we are reading Mr. Jerome K. Jerome turned pedant; but that is an injustice to Mr. Jerome, who would always contrive to be more entertaining than this. . . . We cannot congratulate Mr. Stevens on his attempt to edit Suetonius for the ‘Pink Un.’” To his “wide and vital scholarship,” according to the Pall Mall, “Mr. Stevens unites a vivid and intense dramatic feeling and a strong power of expression. . . . The effect is sometimes splendid, sometimes bizarre, but always amazingly clever.” “Irresponsible humour, buoyant vivacity, facile suggestiveness,” says the National Observer, “. . . are the qualities which make the charm of this fascinating book. . . . By far the greatest achievement is the account given by Ariaramnes of the march of Cyrus the Great against the Massagetae. . . . But this is an exception to the light play of fancy . . . that, with all its apposite allusiveness, is never weighted by . . . antiquarian pedantry.”

“Palladia.” By Mrs. Hugh Fraser.
(Macmillan.)

THE “case-hardened reviewer” of the Daily Telegraph declares that “this complicated but fascinating story of love and intrigue, cunning and malice . . . is even better than The Brown Ambassador”; the promise of which is in Palladia fulfilled, says the National Observer: “We have here a romance of thrilling interest, and if the plot be unconvincing, and the incidents improbable, they do but follow the good old traditions of romance.” These incidents are by the Speaker said to be “always striking and often novel.”

Entirely New Edition of
LIFE AND WORKS OF
ROBERT BURNS.
REVISED AND PARTIALLY REWRITTEN BY WILLIAM WALLACE, M.A.

Illustrated with Etchings and Photogravures from Original Drawings by C. MARTIN HARDIE, R.S.A.; W. D.
MACKAY, R.S.A.; R. B. NISBET, A.R.S.A.; G. O. REID,
A.R.S.A.; and G. PIRIE. A New Photogravure of Naamyth's Portrait, and an Engraving of Beugo's Portrait.

"It is only when one dips into the 'Life' itself that the great amount of care and research which Mr. Wallace has bestowed on his work begins to be appreciated."
Scotsman.
"The Chambers edition is in its old form well known, and has received high praise for the thoroughness of its biography from Mr. Leslie Stephen."—The Times.

PENS AND PENCILS.

A pocket pen—namely, a pen containing nib and automatic ink supply, is a convenience; but only if one can be quite sure that it will not, on occasion, fill the pocket with ink through the feed-hole. A fountain pen saves the trouble of dipping, enables the user to have his own pen always at hand without the necessity of having recourse to his desk, and saves persons who have to write away from home the disagreeableness of using strange nibs. The objections to a pocket fountain pen are the tendency already mentioned to spill the ink, and the necessity of shaking the ink down on to the nib before the pen can be used.

THE CAW FOUNTAIN PEN dispenses with both these objections. It cannot be put away without being hermetically closed; it can be carried in any position, and subjected to any amount of shaking, and not one drop of ink can, by any possibility, get out of it. The nib—which is a gold one of fine quality, and can be selected to suit any hand—is carried actually in the ink, and the pen is thus ready for use the moment it touches the paper. The price is 12s. 6d.

From the foregoing remarks it will be seen that the CAW FOUNTAIN PEN has all the advantages of a stylographic pen, with the additional one of having a nib instead of a style point, so that one writes one's own hand with it; but for people who still prefer a stylograph, the same Company makes the CAW STYLOGRAPHIC PEN. It is better than any other style of stylographic pen ever made, and is, in fact, a perfect ink pencil. The price is 5s.

And now about Pencils. About half the lead of an ordinary lead pencil is wasted in cutting the cedar, about two-thirds of the lead of an ordinary coloured pencil is wasted in the same way, and by breaking while in use. In either case, the point of a pencil, whether black or coloured, is troublesome to make, and, except in the hands of a few skilful persons, irregular and unsightly. THE BLAISDELL SELF-SHARPENING PENCIL is not made of wood at all; it is just like an ordinary pencil, but the lead is covered with paper, and by an ingenious device it can be resharpened by simply pulling off a little of the paper. The sharpening is absolutely automatic; you cannot take off too much or too little of the cover; it is always just right. The point is easily made perfectly symmetrical, and beautifully tapered. There is no possibility of the lead being broken in sharpening, because the lead has only to be lightly touched. The lead is round instead of being square, as in many lead pencils, so that there are no awkward corners to disfigure the writing.

Nobody who has to use a blue pencil, or any coloured pencil, would ever be content with an ordinary one after using a BLAISDELL pencil; and the BLAISDELL black lead pencil is also better than any ordinary black lead pencil ever made. Samples of each kind of pencils will be sent post free, on receipt of 1s., to any address in the United Kingdom by the BLAISDELL PAPER PENCIL CO., 46, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C. British Depot for the CAW pens.

JARROLD & SONS' NEW NOVELS AT ALL LIBRARIES.

BY MAURUS JÓKAI.

THE GREEN BOOK;

Or, Freedom Under the Snow.

By Dr. MAURUS JÓKAI.

Translated by Mrs. WAUGH (ELLIS WRIGHT).

With Engraved Portrait of Dr. JÓKAI. (Authorised Edition.)
Crown 8vo, art linen, gilt top, 6s.

"The Green Book" is an historical romance of the early part of the century, and depicts in a graphic and sometimes lurid manner the political life of Russia during the conspiracies of 1824 and 1825. Pushkin, the well-known Russian poet, is the hero of the book, and the majority of male characters, at least, are personages who figured in the stirring events of the time. At a moment when Russia and things Russian figure so largely in the public press, and exercise so powerful a sway over the national imagination, the publication of this brilliant picture of Russian Society will be specially opportune."

BY SARAH TYTLER.

LADY JEAN'S SON.

By SARAH TYTLER,

Author of "Lady Jean's Vagaries," "The Bride's Pass,"
"Lady Bell," "Buried Diamonds," &c.

Crown 8vo, art linen, gilt top, 6s.

"The glimpses of Edinburgh Society while the Northern Athens was still the seat of fashion, are lifelike and clever. 'Lady Jean's Son' is from first to last a delightful story."—Pall Mall Gazette.

BY MAURUS JÓKAI.

BLACK DIAMONDS.

By MAURUS JÓKAI.

THIRD EDITION. Crown 8vo, art linen, gilt top, 6s.

"It is so well written, so abounding in all sorts of special knowledge and displays so much real literary power, that we never feel tempted to leave any of its pages unread. There are some extremely fine descriptive passages in the book. . . . Maurus Jókai is absolutely original in thought and treatment."—Daily Chronicle.

BY FLORENCE WARDEN.

THE INN BY THE SHORE.

By FLORENCE WARDEN.

FOURTH EDITION. Crown 8vo, art linen, gilt top, 6s.

"Miss Florence Warden is unrivalled in a certain department of fiction. 'The Inn by the Shore' exhibits her at her best. It is full of marvellous mystery, and the clue to this mystery is exceedingly difficult to find in advance."—Academy.

THE ANNUAL VOLUME

OF THE

English Catalogue for 1896 differs from its predecessor in this respect, that it gives the FULL TITLE

With Duplicate, and in many cases Triplicate, Classification under one general alphabet, of every book, instead of as hitherto abbreviated Titles, consequently

The Bulk of the Catalogue is increased by over 80 pages,

whilst the price (5s. net) remains the same.

It WILL BE READY IN A FEW DAYS.

SOME PRESS OPINIONS ON FORMER ISSUES.

"The English Catalogue" is a publication of national importance. There is nothing existing that has any claim to be compared with it as a ready guide to the vast fields of modern publications."—Daily News.

"Such a book is immensely useful to all who have to do with the literature of the day."—Athenæum.

"We need scarcely point out how valuable a work of reference this well-known catalogue affords, as it is not only the names of books which are furnished in these pages, but also the dates of publication, an indication of the size, and the name of the publisher. The principal works imported from the United States of America are also included in this admirable volume."—Daily Telegraph.

"The English Catalogue of Books" is known and appreciated by librarians and those engaged in literary research wherever English books are used, and the new volume of the work is sure of a wide and hearty welcome."—Scotsman.

"To say that it is indispensable to whole classes and interests is mere commonplace. It is in its class the most useful of records. The entire work is, indeed, a precious record."—Notes and Queries.

LORD ROBERTS'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY.

Forty-one Years in India: From Subaltern to Commander-in-Chief. By Field-Marshal Lord Roberts, V.C. (Bentley & Son.)

"I WAS one of the lucky few."

This brief sentence, in which Lord Roberts modestly dismisses his part in that famous storming of the Shah-najaf at Lucknow, where, in final challenge to success, the Commander-in-Chief, Sir Colin Campbell, himself led the attack, gives the keynote to this Symphony "Eroica" in two volumes; for from start to finish the record contained in them is one of unbroken, buoyant disregard of difficulty, of irresistible good fortune. To proclaim this as the most salient feature of this delightful autobiography is not in any way to discount the ability, the untiring energy which has, as it were, seized on success and held it hard; it is simply to show the wisdom of Tommy Atkins in his devotion to the leader whom he loves, in reverent familiarity, to call "little Bobs." For, as the fighting legions of Rome held, good fortune is the first qualification of a soldier; and here we have a record of forty-one years' service without a scratch, without a greater shadow of reverse than that which compelled the British force to dignified retreat within the walls of Shergur. And of that Lord Roberts can write, after eighteen years of fuller experience, that he has "failed to discover that any disposition of my force different from what I made could have had better results, or that what did occur could have been averted by greater forethought . . . two deviations from my programme (which probably at the time appeared unimportant to the commanders in question) were the principal factors in bringing about the unfortunate occurrence."

The above extract, however, does not only serve to show the most striking feature of the book—namely, the well-founded and vigorous self-confidence which constitutes a leader of men—it also sets clearly before us the kindly, generous consideration for others which keeps these thousand and odd pages free from an unkind word—free, even from merited blame—save, oddly enough, for one unhappy, and not altogether blame-worthy, civilian!

As an autobiography, then, Lord Roberts's book is a wholesome tonic, especially in these dismal winter days. As we follow the fortunes of a frank youngster to whom, ere he was five and twenty, the full confidence of such men as John Nicholson was apparently given; who bore a charmed life in the deadliest of campaigns; and who, when it was over, refused even to take the smallpox from which his room-fellow died, we feel that summer may come at any moment. We are in a world of miracles. Here is one:

"I descried in the distance two Sepoys making off with a standard, which I determined must be captured. So I rode after the rebels. . . . While wrenching the staff out of the hands of one of them, whom I cut down, the other put his musket close to my body and fired; fortunately for me it missed fire, and I carried off the standard."

And, of course, a well-deserved Victoria Cross also.

Here is another:

"My greyhound put up an antelope—so close that Watson with his sword gashed his quarter. Off he started, and we after him full speed."

Two reckless lads, briefly, after a wounded quarry in an enemy's country, until, after some miles,

"we beheld moving towards us from our front a body of the enemy's cavalry. We were in an awkward position."

Very; for their horses had to be retreated slowly to give them a chance of regaining breath before the mad ride for life which seemed imminent—inevitable, indeed, when the enemy was seen to open out and prepare to charge.

"We thought our last hour was come . . . we bade each other good-bye . . . agreeing that neither was to wait for the other, when lo! the horsemen vanished as though the ground had opened and swallowed them. . . . What we had seen was simply a mirage."

As one reads this, hey presto! the dulness which has invaded one's very brain becomes a mirage also. The world grows young, and we are young too. The dictionary on the writing-table holds no such word as fail. We put on our goloshes cheerfully, and go out to buy yet one more wreath of bay for a man who, after doing brave deeds for forty years, can sit down and write of them with a pen almost as skilful as his sword.

So much for the book as a mere autobiography. It has, however, a much more serious side as an account, at first hand, of the two most important events of later Indian history—the Mutiny and the Kabul war. Of the former it may be said, briefly, that while Lord Roberts adds many graphic touches to the well-known picture, it remains, in composition and chiaro-oscuro, very much as we have been accustomed to see it—namely, a sharply contrasted duel between virtue and vice, murder and manliness. This is to be deplored, since Lord Roberts—in a summary which appears from internal evidence to have been added later—admits freely that the famous cartridges were, at first, actually coated with the defiling tallow, and that therefore the commanding officers by denying this (in natural ignorance and disbelief of almost incredible fact) did give the Sepoys ample grounds for the panic-stricken distrust of their rulers' honesty, which led to the Mutiny. Had this and his other admissions regarding our lamentable lack of comprehension been incorporated with his account of the outbreak at Meerut, there would have been no possibility of their being overlooked or underestimated.

The extreme difficulty, however, of justly estimating the inner bearings of outward facts in the turmoil of '57 may be shown once and for all by Lord Roberts's strictly accurate account of the circumstances of Col. Spottiswoode's suicide. This officer, we gather from the narrative, shot himself when it became palpably necessary to disarm the regiment he had trusted. He did. Yet he did not shoot himself from disappointment in it, or despair at his own credulity. There was another factor in the tragedy, which Lord Roberts omits. He had, rightly or wrongly, given a solemn promise to his men that they should not be disarmed; and when—with a brigade marching on them for the purpose—they came to their colonel and upbraided him, there seemed no other course whereby to vindicate his own truth, his own honour. In this incident it will be observed the bare facts remain the same, but the knowledge of motive changes mere personal despair and moral cowardice into, maybe, a last supreme effort to make men believe and remain loyal. And so, to the present writer, it seems in many another incident. The balance is held justly enough; but the weights are made in England.

In the majority of cases, and, of course, in the purely military problems, it is perhaps right that this should be so. For instance, the question as to whether Meerut could have helped Delhi on that fatal night of May 10 is one on which Lord Roberts's opinion must carry great weight, though such weight is due solely to his subsequent experience as a commander, since he speaks only from hearsay. Perhaps he is right in holding that the forty—or thirty-five—miles of straight white road between Delhi and Meerut was an impassable barrier; but what of that shorter one? What of the twenty-five feet or so of metallised mail which lay between the north side of the Meerut cantonment where two thousand Englishmen were bivouacked, and the south side where roof-trees were blazing, and women and children screaming for help? Surely someone might have been spared to still these cries and restore order in Meerut itself? Lord Roberts does not touch on this question, and perhaps he is right. It is a sorry subject, though in the face of all the concentrated valour of these two volumes it is one no Englishman need fear to ask.

The pros and cons of the assault on Delhi are, again, as debatable now as they were when all India hung on the verdict, and men like Hodson, Medley, Baird-Smith, and many another, hungered for advance; but of the fact that on June 8, after Badli-ki Sarai, Delhi was absolutely unprepared for assault or resistance, and that the fugitive Sepoys were running into the city with their message of defeat and out of it again by the southern gates there can be no possible doubt.

There is, however, one much-disputed point in the last scene of the Delhi drama on which Lord Roberts speaks with a degree of certainty and authority which cannot be overlooked.

"A report," he says, "was circulated that a large number of men . . . were disgracefully drunk. . . . I did not see a single drunken man throughout the day of the assault, although, as I have related, I visited every position held by our troops within the walls of the city."

This is very strong evidence, coming as it does from one who—it has been inferred by some critics—was specially sent round by Sir Archdale Wilson to report on the matter. It directly contradicts the accounts given by Capt. Ireland and a score of other eye-witnesses, and seems incompatible with Major Hodson's remark, written five days after the assault, that

"the troops were utterly demoralised by hard work and hard drink."

The natural inference, reconciling these statements, would be that the drunkenness occurred after the assault, were it not that Major Hodson directly attributes Nicholson's death—and that of four other officers killed during the assault—to this demoralisation. Again, we have the official fact that whatever report was made resulted in an urgent general order, dated the very morning after, directing the destruction of all liquor to be found. And that—as the chaplain writes regretfully—despite the fact that wine and brandy were urgently needed for hospital work. So the truth must remain, like many another, with two sides to the shield.

Perhaps the most interesting part of the book, however, is that where Lord Roberts gives his views as to the prospect of another mutiny, and of the present causes of dissatisfaction among the natives. And here it is curious to find his shrewdness hitting on one cause without his apparently knowing the reason of the objection. This is our Forest law. The fact being that any interference with fruit trees has in India been for ages the touchstone of tyranny on the part of a ruler, so that their taxation has come to be considered a legitimate rag of revolt. Not long ago, for instance, before the marking of trees which a few years back caused so much alarm, this doctrine was largely preached about Benares by religious mendicants, and it is quite possible that the subsequent smearing of mangoes was an effort to make the populace believe that the trees were being marked with a view to taxation.

In regard to the remedy for these dissatisfactions Lord Roberts has much of solid good sense to say; but, in effect, all suggestions are subservient to a calm acceptance of the fact that there must needs be dissatisfaction. India at present may be best likened to a nursery during the periodical invasions of Master Tommy from school. Emancipated Tommy, free of tuck-shops, rebellious against kindly despotism, clamorous for jam at tea, railing against autocratic nurse, who with an eye to the future digestions of her younger charges declines to allow unlimited brandy-balls and general freedom. The result to the babes (who look up to Tommy as a glorified self) being tears. To quit simile, it is inevitable that our highly educated native youth should feel itself unduly limited; inevitable that those still in tutelage should join in like outcry. So, to a certain extent, our safety lies in autocracy, in remembering that the one raison d'être of our existence in India is tutelage.

There are many other topics touched on in these volumes which deserve a careful survey. The mere account of the celebrated march from Kandahar to Kabul would in itself require pages for adequate review. Lord Roberts himself, we observe, agrees with those who, while applauding it to the uttermost as a masterly exposition of what a picked force can do, fails to think it by any means his greatest achievement. And in this he shows his usual judgment. For, after all, Sir Donald Stewart's previous march from Kandahar to Kabul was more difficult. It was over a then unknown road, on which supplies, instead of being plentiful, were scarce, and in the teeth of opposition which culminated at Ahmed Kheyl. The difference in time—twenty-four as against sixteen days—may seem considerable, but it dwindles actually before the remembrance that the march was made, not by picked battalions, but by a force burdened by unnecessary camp followings, defective transport, and an elephant battery. It was, indeed, the slow progress of the latter over the passes which prompted Tommy Atkins's well-known conundrum as to its title No. 5, 11, of which the answer runs: "Beco's it starts at five in the mornin' and don't get in till eleven at night!"

Still, if military exploits are to be judged less by their intrinsic difficulty than by their value to the nation at large, there can be no doubt that merit as well as good fortune makes the name on the title-page of this stirring book Lord Roberts of Kandahar. In closing it we are left with a vague wonder as to how, in the piping times of peace which arbitration is introducing to the civilised world, we shall replace that stern teaching of danger and death which trained the men of whom we have just read with so much admiration.

SERIOUS SUBJECTS.

Common Thoughts on Serious Subjects: Addresses to Older Kumars of the Rajkumar College, Kathiawar. By the late Chester Macnaghten. (Murray.)

The Sermon on the Mount: a Practical Exposition. By Charles Gore, Canon of Westminster, &c. (Murray.)

It may not be at first sight evident why these two books should admit of being reviewed in one article. The late Mr. Chester Macnaghten, as principal of a college for the education of the sons of Rajput princes, delivered his addresses to an audience which did not profess the religion of himself and Canon Gore; he was severely debarred from the teaching of Christian doctrine: he could but appeal for the sanction of his moral precepts and counsels, urged upon young Hindus, to the name of "God," and to the higher meanings of that in their own faith. Canon Gore also is concerned solely with the moral law in wide practical application; but his purpose is to demonstrate the illumination and the potency given to the moral law through that dogmatic fact, Christ both human and divine. Mr. Macnaghten was restricted to a literary incidental use of Christian moral teaching; to quotation from Thomas à Kempis, or Robertson of Brighton, side by side with the sages and scriptures of ancient India, and from such indeterminate moralists of the West as Emerson, Carlyle, Arnold. Time and time again you feel his own longing to let his own definite Christianity break forth, and give its divine point to what he is saying; you see him comforting himself with the thought common to the nobler Christians of all ages, that God is nowhere and never without witness, even among idolatries and delusions of belief. Faith, Prayer, Duty, Gentleness, Truth, Courage, Friendship, Purity, Home, Time, Money, Manners—these and such like are his themes, treated with singular beauty and nobility of tone; they tend towards the formation of a chivalrous character in the descendants of proud and lawless princes: noblesse oblige, and Mr. Macnaghten expounds to the utmost the meaning of the words. The results of his long labours in the Rajkumar College of Kathiawar have been admirable: he has trained some of the truest gentlemen among the Rajput nobles of to-day not to be spurious Englishmen, but to be high-minded Hindus, public-spirited, refined, responsible. That Prince Ranjitsinhji was one of his pupils, in cricket as in other things, shows the wholesome and vigorous catholicity of his aims and powers. Reading this book, we think of Sir Alfred Lyall's Rajput Chief of the Old School:

"The English say I govern ill,
That laws must silence spear and gun,
So may my peaceful subjects till;
But peaceful subjects have I none.
I can but follow my father's rule;
I cannot learn in an English school;
Yet the hard world softens, and change is best,
My sons must leave the ancient ways,
The folk are weary, the land shall rest,
And the gods are kind, for I end my days."

These addresses are like the finest sermons, preached by the wisest masters, at any of the English public schools, in the strength and winningness of their morality, in knowledge of youth and of life, in the inspiration of the personality behind them: they are magnificent examples of "undenominational" religious teaching which leans upon the dogmatic facts of no creed, but upon the loftiest moral teaching of all creeds, in the universal name of God. And to Mr. Macnaghten himself, good as he saw his work to be, yet this inevitable vagueness or eclecticism was a sore grief: to take the best from the Vedas, the Bible, the Koran, the Stoics, the saints, the men of science and philosophy, the heroes and the poets, that he might establish a kind of ecumenical sanction and consensus for moral truths, which in Christianity alone found their plenary consecration—that troubled him. The moral sanctity of life, at home and abroad, the sense of personal and social responsibility, was what he chiefly impressed upon the young Kumars; and he could not, in honour, "rise to the height of that great argument" by appealing to the faith that was in him. He might speak of Christ, but only as he spoke of Socrates, Confucius, Mohammed, Buddha: he might call him godlike, but not God.

It is just here that Canon Gore has the unspeakable advantage over Mr. Macnaghten. There is not a clause in the Sermon on the Mount which cannot be paralleled from earlier sources: there is no teaching in it which Mr. Macnaghten has not pressed upon his Hindu pupils. And there are plenty of Christians who find in its "simple morality" the whole of Christianity. What matters, they say, Homoisation or Homoisation: the Sermon on the Mount is enough. They ignore the fact that the Sermon derives its unique significance and palmary distinction from the Personality of the Preacher: they are "the Mountites," so called by the artist Samuel Palmer, because they "use our blessed Lord's sermon as a wall behind which to skulk, while they are throwing stones at St. Paul"—i.e., at dogmatic faith. Mr. Gore, bit by bit, scrutinises the teaching of the Sermon "in the light of the Incarnation," and of all its consequences regarding the relations of God and man. He is not content to take the Beatitudes, the Lord's Prayer, the precepts of the Sermon as isolated utterances, disconnected from the whole province or kingdom of Christian belief; they must be interpreted according to the analogy of the faith, and made to yield their full contents in harmony with that. Mr. Gore is peculiarly successful in his reverent familiarising of Scripture, his treatment of it as the word of the Living Word, and therefore ever fresh, new, practical, applicable; he has none of that fatal slavery to the letter, which has turned oriental imagery and ancient custom into matter of literal observance for all time, whilst the inner soul and spirit are neglected. And it is upon social aspects of Christianity that he most dwells, since it is barely possible to conceive of any other; the Incarnation brought about a divine solidarity of mankind, as brother members of their Head, so that what pantheism destroyed, while it desired—true union of God and man—has become operative and real in Christ. Here is the faith which Mr. Macnaghten held so firmly, yet could but adumbrate or suggest from afar to his Hindu listeners; a strength of personal union with the Divinity in a divine society, a fellowship in positive fact, neither metaphor nor a aspiration.

Mr. Gore's book, though richly suggestive, is slight in extent; and it prompts the wish that he would undertake a scientific study of Christian ethics and casuistry from his Anglican position. Anglican theology is poor, indeed, in this department: Taylor's Ductor Dubitantium, Saunderson's De Conscientia, with a few more, are works of note; but this poverty is in strange contrast with the wealth both of English moral philosophy and of Roman Catholic moral theology. Casuistry has a bad name, which, teste Christo, does not prove it a bad thing: but we are all casuists every day. Casuistry is but the codification of moral laws, grouping instances and exceptions and qualifications under various heads, with appeals to authority and to precedent, yet with an eye to possibilities and new necessities, to cases that might or may arise. Mr. Gore, in his applications of first principles and permanent commandments to the circumstances of the age, is constantly throwing out subtle suggestions and adding noteworthy instances, which would come with greater force were they parts of a systematic treatise. For ethics are not simple at all; the ethical sense, the royalty of conscience, have an august simplicity in their essence; but the multitude and multiplicity of particular occasions for their exercise are far from simple. We want definitions, distinctions, differentiating and discriminating decisions.

When, if ever, is a lie not a lie? Both these books contain a special note upon that vexed famous question, and neither Mr. Gore nor Mr. Macnaghten, in discussion with his pupils, finds a satisfactory answer. May we tell a lie to misguide an intending murderer? Mr. Jowett, so Mr. Gore tells us, used to say: "I suppose I should tell the lie, but I had rather not think about it beforehand or justify it afterwards." Newman, characteristically, calls that "the unscientific way of dealing with lies," and states it in words almost identical with Mr. Jowett's: "It is a necessary frailty, and had better not be thought about before it is incurred, and not thought of again after it is well over." This view, he says, "cannot for a moment be defended, but, I suppose, it is very common." An Indian authority, quoted by Mr. Macnaghten, lays down the law that a lie for just cause is permissible, but the liar must "ask pardon of God." Doubtless, this particular question is a somewhat unique crux in ethics: but almost all moral questions admit easily and often of like entanglements. Cases of dual and divided duty, as in collision between Church and State, conscience and law, society and the individual, must admit of logical solution, if ethical science or moral theology be more than an academic theorising or abstract speculation. Rough-and-ready maxims do not help us in special cases: "The distressed general," says Mr. Stevenson,

"the baited divine, the hesitating author, decide severally to do what Napoleon, what St. Paul, what Shakespeare would have done; and there remains only the minor question, What is that?"

Broadly, we know the right thing to do; but it is hard to discern what allowances to make for the particular, peculiar, especial circumstances of the case in the form of it that confronts us. For in every instance of a moral problem there is some exceptional and individual element of uncertainty, which may be the most trifling of scruples, yet may also be the very core and kernel of the whole matter. Mr. Jowett, in his disheartening "Essay on Casuistry," writes: "A tender conscience is a conscience unequal to the duties of life." But a robust conscience is often one which rides rudely over half the delicacies and refinements of morality, declining to be "bothered with scruples." Modern commercial life, to say nothing of political, abounds in such convenient consciences. The complexity of life, which is ever increasing, requires an equivalent complexity or thorough catholicity of ethical doctrine. Mr. Gore gives us plenty of illustrations, and an excellent brief analysis of what the "new commandments" of Christianity entail upon us, what is the distinctive Christian character, habit of mind and soul, practical attitude towards the world and its circumstances: but we should greatly welcome something more detailed. Not, indeed, such a work as was done by the much maligned Jesuit Fathers of the seventeenth century, who wrote mainly in usum confessorum; yet a treatise of Christian ethics methodically, even dryly, handled. Sermons, and essays upon moral matters, are wont to be rather formative in tendency than informative: they quicken the conscience into a desire to do right, but they cannot help in the actual cases and necessities of action that severally present themselves. No doubt there are those who rely upon systematic ethical helps, as a traveller upon his guide-book, with no initiative of their own; but even that extreme is better than the extreme of indifference. It is significant that the First Council met to decide not a point of dogmatic faith, but of moral discipline: a point affecting "tender consciences." And no one can say that our times show any tendency to the sin of scrupulosity: rather, we are apt to trust in that vague thing, a progressive sense of moral obligation, a widening recognition of social responsibility in which a general good feeling, based upon sentiment, takes the place of a definite and authoritative Christian law. Christianity did not invent morality, but gave it a vivifying interpretation and expansion through the person and office of Christ. This, upon which Canon Gore insists, and which Mr. Macnaghten felt to be the salt and sustenance of moral training, is endangered by sole reliance upon the diffusion of philanthropic impulse. The realities which Canon Gore has, to use an old word, so well "expiscated" from the Sermon on the Mount, supply pith and sap to our wills: he lays them before us, not as mere beautiful sublimities or counsels of perfection, but as perdurable principles which must have a meaning and a message for our day and its accidents. And for all the world as well as for those whose characters were so finely influenced by the strong and gentle character of Mr. Macnaghten.

A LADY-TRAVELLER IN AFRICA.

Travels in West Africa—Congo Français, Corisco, and Cameroons. By Mary H. Kingsley. Illustrated. (Macmillans.)

THIS is more than an ordinary book of travel. In the first place, Miss Kingsley's personal achievements are considerably above the average both in point of novelty and endurance; and in the second, the information which she conveys is a genuine and important contribution to our knowledge of the regions with which she deals.

In brief, Miss Kingsley has navigated without any European escort or attendant the dangerous course of the Upper Ogowé River; crossed the country between the Ogowé and the Rembwé, traversing forest and swamp and penetrating the villages of the cannibal Fans, where no white man, and not even a coloured trader, had set foot before her; and ascended the great Peak of Cameroons which rises for 13,760 feet above sea level. In this latter exploit she had been anticipated by twenty-seven persons, of whom two were of English blood. The more solid results of Miss Kingsley's excursions and investigations are conveyed partly in the form of appendices and partly in the form of the "subject" chapters with which her narrative is interspersed. The specimens of reptiles, fish, insects, plants and grasses, which she brought home with her, are duly classified and arranged in appendices by Dr. Günther and Mr. W. F. Kirby, both of the British Museum. She herself contributes appendices on "Trade and Labour," and "Disease," in West Africa. Within the 627 pages of the text are included her own observations of the manners, industries, language, and religious beliefs of the native tribes—especially the Fans—chiefly grouped in the chapters on "Fetish"; and an interesting account of the achievements of Du Chaillu and De Brazza, and of French administration and French ambitions in West Africa, is given in the chapter headed "Congo Français." The Cameroons, and other West Coast settlements, although they are not treated so fully, are not neglected.

It is impossible to do more than thus indicate in outline the ground covered by Miss Kingsley's volume; but it is both possible and desirable to add that the information which she gives is drawn from her own personal observation, and that she has twice visited the West Coast of Africa for considerable periods. In all cases she frankly states the evidence upon which she bases her conclusions; and, as a result of this frankness, the reader can benefit by her observations even when he is not disposed to adopt the conclusions which she suggests.

Miss Kingsley's central achievements were the navigation of the Ogowé rapids from Talagouga, and her subsequent expedition by river and land from Kangwe through the Fan country to Agonjo, and thence down the Rembwé to Glass Gaboon on the coast. On both of these achievements we propose to say a word. The Ogowé river is the largest stream between the Niger and the Congo; and, according to the French, it is the largest "strictly equatorial" river in the world. Miss Kingsley tells us that it stretches for about 700 miles fairly neatly along the line, thus draining the central regions of the Congo Français. It is navigable for 200 miles from the coast by steamboats; but at this point—just above Njole—its course is traversed by the Sierra del Cristal range, and, owing to this circumstance, becomes for 500 miles a succession of perilous rapids barely navigable for canoes.

Up this region of the Ogowé rapids Miss Kingsley laboriously proceeded (from the French Mission at Talagouga) in a canoe with a crew of eight Igalwas, of whom two only could speak English. With this slender equipment she made her way up to the Kondo Kondo Island, and gazed upon the great Alemba rapid which rushes past its northern shore. Of this she writes:

"Its face was like nothing I have seen before. Its voice was like nothing I have heard. Those other rapids are not to be compared to it; they are wild, headstrong, and malignant enough, but the Alemba is not as they. It does not struggle, and writhe, and brawl among the rocks, but comes in a majestic springing dance, a stretch of waltzing foam, triumphant.

"The beauty of the night on Kondo Kondo was superb; the sun went down and the after glow flashed across the sky in crimson, purple, and gold, leaving it a deep violet-purple, with the great stars hanging in it like moons, until the moon herself rose, lighting the sky long before she sent her beams down on us in this valley. As she rose, the mountains hiding her face grew harder and harder in outline, and deeper and deeper black, while those opposite were just enough illumined to let one see the wefts and floating veils of blue-white mist upon them, and when at last, and for a short time only, she shone full down on the savage foam of the Alemba, she turned it into a soft silver mist. Around, on all sides flickered the fire-flies, who had come to see if our fire was not a big relation of their own, and they were the sole representatives, with ourselves, of animal life. When the moon had gone, the sky, still lit by the stars, seeming indeed to be in itself lambent, was very lovely, but it shared none of its light with us, and we sat round our fire surrounded by an utter darkness. Cold, clammy drifts of almost tangible mist encircled us; ever and again came cold faint puffs of wandering wind, weird and grim beyond description."

The return journey was still more dangerous. M'bo, Miss Kingsley's head man, prophesied evil, and although the canoe eventually reached Talagouga without mishap, he does not appear to have been unduly pessimistic.

"Twice," she writes, "we had a near call by being shut in between two pinnacle rocks, within half an inch of being fatally close to each other for us; but after some alarming scrunching sounds and creaks from the canoe, we were shot ignominiously out down river. Several times we got on to partially submerged table rocks, and were unceremoniously bundled off them by the Ogowé, irritated at the hindrance we were occasioning."

But Miss Kingsley appears to have enjoyed the boisterous conduct of the Ogowé; indeed, she seems to have enjoyed everything in West Africa—nature, the natives, and the wild beasts. She continues:

"The grandest part of the whole time was coming down, below the Alemba, where the whole great Ogowé takes a tiger-like spring for about half a mile before it strikes a rock reef below."

But here she allows that a little carefulness is desirable.

"All you have got to do is to keep your canoe-head straight—quite straight, you understand—for any failure to do so will land you the other side of the tomb, instead of in a cheerful no-end-of-a-row with the lower rapid's rocks."

In her expedition across the Fan country, Miss Kingsley started from Kangwe, a place on the north bank of the Ogowé, below Talagouga, and about 130 miles from the mouth of the river. She set off in a canoe rowed by four Ajumbas, and, making her way by various rivers, soon found herself among the homes of these unsophisticated savages. But by this time she had enlisted some of them in her service, and, in general, she appears to have got on excellently with them, staying in their villages, where the chiefs placed their dwellings at her disposal. Of the character of the Fans in these parts, she writes that their colour is light bronze, and their average height from five-feet six to five-feet eight.

"The Fan is full of fire, temper, intelligence and go; very teachable, rather difficult to manage, quick to take offence, and utterly indifferent to human life. I ought to say that other people who should know him better than I say he is a treacherous, thievish, murderous cannibal."

As it is plain from Miss Kingsley's narrative that she did run very considerable risks in placing herself entirely at the mercy of these people, it is interesting to trace the reasons of her success. Apparently she owed her safety to her coolness, her tact, and her refusal to show any sign of fear, even when she had excellent reasons for feeling alarm. This in the first place; and, secondly, she was careful to make herself a persona grata to these undisciplined savages by the exercise of a discreet generosity; by the custom of "shedding things," to use her own phrase. Speaking of the natives, she says:

"It is their custom to hang round one in their native wilds in the hope something will be shed, either intentionally or unintentionally. Not, I fancy, for the bald sake of the article itself, but from a sort of sporting interest in what the next thing shed will be. I know it is my chief charm to them, and they hang round wondering whether it will be matches, leaf-tobacco, pocket-handkerchiefs, or fish-hooks; and when the phenomena flag they bring me various articles for sale to try to get me into working order again."

In addition to her adventures with the Fans, Miss Kingsley passed through a dense tropical forest, and a still more embarrassing tropical swamp (where all the company had to wade neck-high in slimy water), before she eventually emerged at the factory at Agonjo, on the Rembwé, which formed the objective of her march. En route, it is scarcely necessary to add, she had opportunities of studying crocodiles, elephants, hippopotami, and gorillas in their native haunts. After such experiences as these, dropping down the Rembwé to the coast was pleasant work; and it was now that Miss Kingsley had her most delightful bit of tropical travel:

"Much as I have enjoyed life in Africa," she writes, "I do not think I ever enjoyed it to the full as I did on those nights dropping down the Rembwé. The great, black, winding river with a pathway in its midst of frosted silver where the moonlight struck it: on each side the ink-black mangrove-walls, and above them the band of star and moonlit heavens that the walls of mangrove allowed one to see. Forward rose the form of our sail, idealised from bedsheetdom to glory; and the little red glow of our cooking fire gave a single note of warm colour to the cold light of the moon."

Before concluding this brief account of a very interesting and singularly instructive book, it is necessary to say a word or two on Miss Kingsley's literary manner. The passages quoted above show that her descriptive writing often reaches a very high standard of merit. At the same time, in recording her personal experiences and sensations, she frequently adopts a style which is frankly colloquial. Here she exhibits a keen sense of humour, and a considerable aptitude for the dramatic presentation of incident; and it is these passages, in which she allows her personal characteristics to appear most clearly, which will give the book its special charm for the average man or woman. In respect of production, the book is well supplied with useful illustrations, but it lacks a map. This is a serious oversight, as the Congo Français is practically an unknown land in British atlases.

THE AMERICAN AT HOME.

The Land of the Dollar. By G. W. Steevens. (Blackwood.)

"If Africa begins at the Pyrenees and Asia at Budapest, then America begins on the departure platform at Euston. There, at least, it began on the blazing 29th of August, when, an obscure and perplexed Columbus, I started on a voyage of discovery to America."

It is thus Mr. Steevens begins his book, and we cannot do better by way of an opening than add something to his insufficient description of himself. Perplexed he may have been, this Columbus, but also he was clear-sighted in an unusual degree, well instructed in affairs, keen-witted, humorous, devoid of superstitions, and gifted with a singularly trenchant style. Moreover, however obscure Columbus might have been in August, he is so no longer; he takes his place in the first rank of descriptive writers and social observers. This book grew from the circumstance that the proprietor of the Daily Mail, with an enterprise that hitherto has been more associated with the penny than the halfpenny, dispatched Mr. Steevens to America to watch the recent election, and record his impressions generally. Mr. Steevens, though an experienced journalist, had not, we believe, done similar work before; indeed, we have a notion that his most brilliant efforts previously had been a series of high-spirited paragraphs concerning passages in the life of Jane Cakebread, and a collection of witty and penetrating Monologues of the Dead, whilst he bore a reputation for scholarship and political sagacity. Mr. Harmsworth, however, selected his correspondent wisely. The Land of the Dollar more than justifies his action: it is always the best journalism, and now and again very good literature.

The keynote of the American character, Mr. Steevens says somewhere, is its irresistible impulse to impress all its sentiments externally by the most obvious medium; and Mr. Steevens has caught the habit. As an observer he takes always the line of least resistance, and, having instinct, his illustrations are impregnable. Here, for example, is a passage which conveys more meaning than would a whole chapter of description. In a train at Pittsburgh Mr. Steevens met Mr. McKinley's brother:

"Of his discourse it is not needful to speak; it was shrewd and good-humoured rather than grammatical. He was not unmindful of the spittoon. He talked quite freely about his celebrated brother, and he talked to everybody who liked to talk with him. The waiters in the dining-car chaffed him, and the conductor slapped him on the back. This morning I met him again in a Canton newspaper office; he was diverting his mind with a little larking among the reporters. Now, do try to imagine it. When you can conceive the brother of the man who has more than an even chance of becoming the first citizen among sixty millions larking with provincial newspaper reporters and slapped on the back by the conductor of a railway train—why, then you will be a good step on towards the comprehension of the United States of America."

Such concrete illustrations are exactly what the reader needs.

Mr. Steevens saw something of everything; but he does not fall into that common error of "G. T.'s": the confusion of fact and personal impression. He is careful to remind the reader that The Land of the Dollar describes America merely as Mr. Steevens saw it. And he used his eyes well both for large things and small. He describes Chicago and table fish; naval resource and dairy farms; the case for silver and the case for gold; Mormonism and domestic servants; Boston and the Chinese quarter; Mr. McKinley and Mr. Bryan; Niagara and Mr. Wanamaker's store. His mind is always made up. On the negro problem he speaks with decision; and this is his opinion concerning the strained relations between America and this country:

"I think the question we ought to ask ourselves is this, Are we prepared to fight the United States immediately, or are we prepared to take such steps as shall prevent us from fighting them ever? These are the alternatives. . . . It may be asking too much, but if statesmanship could kindly arrange it, I confess I should like to see before I die a war in which Britain and the United States in a just quarrel might tackle the world. After that we should have no more difficulty about America. For if the Americans never forget an injury, they would ever remember a service."

A representative example of Mr. Steevens's lighter descriptive manner is found in this note of an adventure in a Prohibition State, where, after witnessing a disappointing election,

"the only diversion left was to break the Maine Liquor Law. It was put into my head by the genial salutation of a gentleman who could only just keep on his legs. In Maine, as you know, the buying and selling of alcoholic liquor is unconditionally forbidden under I do not quite know what penalty. I thought I would try to incur that unknown penalty. Bethinking me that the barber is the friend of man, I went in and was shaved. 'You can't buy a drink here, I'm told,' I began. 'No,' said the barber, stolidly. 'I suppose people do, though.' 'I don't know much about it. I fancy there's a druggist or two —.' Then, as if by a powerful effort of memory, 'There's a bar right here where you can get it,' he said."

If Mr. Steevens's book reminds us of any one it is Mark Twain, in the Innocents at Home, where he describes the Sandwich Islands, and in parts of the Innocents Abroad. There is the same shrewd common sense and absence of that embroidered egoism which made some of the late Mr. Sala's descriptive journalism such trying reading. Mr. Steevens, however, is a more responsible observer than Mark Twain has ever permitted himself to be. The only kindred work quite comparable with The Land of the Dollar is the series of letters on America contributed by Mr. Kipling to the Times, which, by the way (since Mr. Kipling seems to have left that country for good), might now very well be published in book-form. Mr. Steevens's point of view is more literary and academic than Mr. Kipling's; although one could hardly ask for a more human examination of a country than The Land of the Dollar gives us.

We conclude by quoting the following preamble to the chapter devoted to Chicago:

"Chicago! Chicago, queen and guttersnipe of cities, cynosure and cesspool of the world! Not if I had a hundred tongues, everyone shouting a different language in a different key, could I do justice to her splendid chaos. The most beautiful and the most squalid, girdled with a two-fold zone of parks and slums; where the keen air from lake and prairie is ever in the nostrils, and the stench of foul smoke is never out of the throat; the great port a thousand miles from the sea; the great mart which gathers up with one hand the corn and cattle of the West, and deals out with the other the merchandise of the East; widely and generously planned with streets of twenty miles, where it is not safe to walk at night; where women ride straddlewise, and millionaires dine at mid-day on the Sabbath; the chosen seat of public spirit and municipal boodle, of cut-throat commerce and munificent patronage of art; the most American of American cities, and yet the most mongrel; the second American city of the globe, the fifth German city, the third Swedish, the second Polish, the first and only veritable Babel of the age; all of which twenty-five years ago . . . was a heap of smoking ashes. Where in all the world can words be found for this miracle of paradox and incongruity?"

Whether Mr. Steevens's reader knows America, or whether he does not, no page of The Land of the Dollar can fail to interest him.

PICKLE THE SPY.

Pickle the Spy; or, the Incognito of Prince Charles. By Andrew Lang. (Longmans & Co.)

THIS "woeful history," as Mr. Lang calls it, is the fruit of the study of the Pelham Papers. It contains curious and interesting revelations on two points. First, it brings strong proof (and it is so strong that we confess it seems to us difficult to suppose it can be overthrown) that the spy who calls himself "Pickle," "Alexander Jeanson," &c., Henry Pelham's correspondent, the young chevalier's confidant, is none other than young Glengarry himself—Alastair Ruadh Macdonnell, sometime captain in the Scots Brigade in French service—who died, unmarried, December 23, 1761. It is a horrid thing that "a gentleman of ancient, loyal, and honourable family" should have been capable of descending to such vile treachery simply for lack of spending-money, and in hopes of such rewards as a Government in the Georgian period could give to a useful tool. Poor James Mór, a broken man with ruin to look to and grave dangers about him, might sink to play a double game, but this unutterable scoundrel was not at all in the same hopeless position. Exactly how it was, what was the precise bait that could seem fair enough to make him sully his mean soul in so disgusting a way, we know not. We can only suspect that it was no sudden fall. He begins by what is uncommonly like stealing, "conveying," at the least, it was, and conveying by means of forgery. He is alleged to have "felt the folly of any further concern with the ungrateful family of Stuart, to whom he and his family had been too long attached, to the absolute ruin of themselves and country"; but it is a long way from this defensible position to the degradation of daily betrayal of a man whose misfortunes at least deserved pity, and whose generous confidence was ill-repaid by such cold treason. That there it a Ganelon for every Roland, a Mordred for every Gawain, is an old idea, drawn probably from the observation of the heights of devotion and the depths of treachery that were to be found in feudal times, sometimes even in the same family. But even with a knowledge of the recent revelations of Mr. FitzGerald, one was hardly prepared to find that the heir-apparent of a great Highland clan could bring himself to a lower level than "the man that betrayed Lord Edward."

Mr. Lang has worked out his evidence in an entertaining way, and succeeds in making one follow a somewhat intricate story with swift and shuddering interest. It is in tracking out Glengarry's devious career that our author came upon the true secret history of the obscurest part of Charles Edward's life—the great Prussian intrigue, which was preparing in 1752, when Archibald Cameron went on his last mission to Scotland to concert measures for a third attempt to overthrow the Hanoverian family in favour of the elder branch. But Samuel Cameron and Pickle had made the English Government privy to all that went on in the counsels of the "young Ascanius," and it was evident more and more that Charles's own character and powers were deteriorating, through drink, ill friends, bad advice, and the continual deferring of hope. France and Prussia were ready to use him or cast him off as it suited their shifty politics. His last chance came in 1759, and that was but a poor one, and Hawke swept it away. He was in England for the last time in disguise in 1763. He had overtures from America in 1778. He had stray gleams of hope to the last, but his "reign" was passed in all the misery exile brings, and in a squalid, shabby, physical degradation one hardly likes to dwell on, so sad were all the circumstances that combined against a man who had been endowed with all the gifts of nature except wisdom, and had undergone all the evil misfortune sends but dishonour. One more feeble, gracious, futile life, and the last flower of the White Rose fell.

Pickle seems to have played traitor to the last; a bad chief, a greedy landlord, a character with scarce a redeeming point save animal courage, as far as we can see, in which the chief traits are vanity, greed, and deceit. Yet this man "in the government of the world," as Mr. Lang puts it, "served England well. But for him there might have been another Highland rising, and more fire and bloodshed. But for him the Royal Family might have perished in a nocturnal brawl. Only one man, Archibald Cameron, died through Pickle's treasons. The Prince, with whom he drank and whom he betrayed, had become hopeless and worthless. The world knows little of its greatest benefactors, and Pickle did good by stealth. Now his shade may or may not 'blush to find it fame,' and to be placed above Murray of Broughton, beside Menteith and Assyt, legendary Ganelons of Scotland."

There is, of course, much else of pleasant reading and revelation of character in this volume. We are presented to Madame de Talmond and her friends Madame de Vassé and Mlle. de Ferrand in the convent of St. Joseph, and our poor prince's hiding-places; to the Walkinshaw, whose influence does not seem to have been good from a political point of view. Mr. Lang himself has rarely written a more enticing book for anyone who cares about the scenes and characters that Scott and Thackeray have gilded with romance. We may place this volume, indeed, beside Catriona, which it completes and justifies in an amazing way. There must have been a temptation to make a novel out of this mass of new and startling material, but it was rightly resisted, and, after all, there are few novels so interesting and suggestive as this true story.

We would urge upon Mr. Lang the task he would fain commit to others—the life of the Old Chevalier: he could do it so well that we hope he will, sometime, undertake it. Lost causes have a pathos of their own, and this of the Stuarts has special claims upon a poet and a Scot. The story is pitiful, and it has been "mellowed by the stealing hours of time" till one can listen to it undisturbed by the jarring notes that have now ceased to vex its sad harmony. Mr. Lang has told part of it—why does he not complete it by the history of the "15, the 45, and of those long weary deserts of exile of which these were the sole bright but unfruitful oases"?

SOME SCIENCE TEXT-BOOKS.

This Wonderful Universe. By Agnes Giberne. (Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge.)—This little book has been written with the intention of awakening a greater interest in popular astronomy. With this end in view the authoress has mentioned only the most important facts, and has avoided crowding her pages with statistics. The work has little pretension to style, its sole aim being to make the subject interesting and easily intelligible. In this direction success has been achieved.

The Story of Forest and Stream. By James Rodway. (George Newnes.)—This volume contains a short description of a tropical forest, together with some elementary lessons which can be learned by studying the incessant struggle for existence of its varied flora. Mr. Rodway's opinions on the development of alkaloids and kindred substances are more advanced than the evidence appears to warrant. These and similar ideas, however, serve rather to increase than diminish the interest of a book, the reader of which must be very languid if he fail to catch some of the author's enthusiasm.

Mensuration for Beginners. By F. H. Stevens, M.A. (Macmillans.)—This book can be thoroughly recommended to the beginner, as its contents, which are based upon the requirements of the "Code," are both simple and concise. The rules are stated verbally as well as algebraically, and the rudiments of geometrical drawing are also explained, so that a knowledge of arithmetic is the only necessary preliminary. A good feature is the inclusion among the examples of questions for graphic solution.

Experimental Science. By Arthur Hubble. (Chapman & Hall.)—The author of this book is a Science Demonstrator under the London School Board, and a teacher of Technology in connexion with the City and Guilds Institute. His first aim has been, therefore, to produce a text-book which should assure a competent training in experimental methods for pupils in the elementary schools. We have looked through several chapters, such as those on weights and measures, relative densities, heat, and mechanical principles, and have no fault to find with the simple yet thorough way in which the experiments are described. Following each section are easy exercises bearing upon the subject matter.

A New Course of Experimental Chemistry. (Revised edition.) By J. Castell-Evans. (Thomas Murby.)—This book contains much that is suggestive to the teacher, but to junior students it will be of little use, though doubtless its difficulties are somewhat lessened by the publication of a key. The carefully arranged experiments would be greatly improved by a fuller description, and this would also prevent the necessity of referring the pupil to an (?) Appendix ("App."), which is apparently another publication. This practice is the more to be deprecated as the book seems designed for the poorer class of students.

FICTION.

The Red Scur. By P. Anderson Graham.
(Longmans.)

MR. GRAHAM calls his story "a novel of manners," and so it is in so far as he depicts manners and men belonging to an order of things which is rapidly passing away. Strictly speaking, there is very little plot in it, and some of the characters are but faintly realised. When this is said fault-finding is exhausted, and we have nothing but praise for the book, which does for Northumberland something of what Mr. Barrie has done for Forfarshire. It is written by one who has evidently a fervent love of nature. The bits of natural description scattered through the volume are delightful reading. There is nothing so easy, and yet nothing so difficult, as this kind of writing; but Mr. Graham is an easy master of it. Of the characters in the story one stands out beyond all the others inviting admiration. This is Billy White, the thriftless, reckless, jovial, self-satisfied yeoman. He is a splendid figure, and Mr. Graham is to be congratulated on having given the world a picture of a man not unworthy of Fielding. Once you get to know Billy White you can't forget him. He is full of vital energy; he fills your eye, his voice is in your ear, you can almost feel his hand upon your shoulder. Some of his exploits are on a big scale, and although he is sometimes vanquished, as in his great bout with the landlord of the "Talbots," yet, like all great men, he is not on that account unduly cast down. There is not another character in the book to compare with him, because it would be impossible to have two Billy Whites in the same book, they would destroy each other. But some of the other characters are drawn with no less skill. The brothers Harbottle are extreme types of character, but you are convinced of the truthfulness of the portraiture. The younger people are not so satisfactory. Lil, Billy White's daughter, begins well, and you expect the author is going to make something fine of her, but she falls off when she begins to do up her hair, and it is not easy to understand her exact relations with the three young men who are all in love with her. And we are far from being pleased with her final choice. Mark Harbottle was hardly the young man to become son-in-law to Billy White, as that worthy fully recognised. Yet of him you must say what you feel is true of all Mr. Graham's characters, that he is drawn from life. There is always the danger, of course, that in being true to nature you may miss being true to art. With the exception of Billy White, Mr. Graham has not idealised any of his characters. The Red Scur is a novel of manners with one full-drawn, artistically realised character. The manners are admirably depicted, the book has style, and Billy White is a great character.

The Story of Hannah. By W. J. Dawson.
(Hodder & Stoughton.)

WHAT is one to say of a book of which chapters i., iii., and xxii. are autobiographical, while the rest are mainly impersonal narrative? The fact is, it is better to judge The Story of Hannah as a series of sketches on the Thrums model than as a novel. By this means you avoid the necessity of ransacking Mr. Dawson's agglomeration of incidents in search of a plot, and can devote yourself to the more agreeable task of studying the fine gallery of portraits which he has drawn. The characterisation is as good as the construction is faulty. An acquaintance to be cherished is the Rev. William Romilly, who ministers to the spiritual necessities of South Barton in a red-brick chapel, which stands "with an air of obstinacy" at the end of a narrow lane. What the Scotch would call a "dour" man, he tones down the pretentiousness of "Georgiana" to "Hannah"; he won't have his house corrupted by "Adam Bede"; he is so excessively perverse that his daughter knows the only way to get him in to tea from the garden is not to send for him; he forbids his wife and daughter to go up to the attic and cry over the dead baby's toys, and yet does so himself. Then there is the Rev. Mr. Scaley, who preaches that Madagascar is off the coast of India, and excuses himself on the ground that "it doesn't matter so long as the spirit is right"; Pugh, the grocer, prone to conspiracies in his back parlour; and the pathetic figure of the overworked, faithful, uncomplaining wife—all of them are drawn with a pen which illumines and a sympathy which touches. Not the least characteristic passage in the book is the description in the first chapter of the childish apprehension aroused by the "selling-up" of a local grocer:

"We remembered that neither of us had received our pocket money that week, in which circumstance we discerned the indubitable shadow of our fate. 'We are bankrupt,' cried Mary. 'We banrap,' echoed Philip. The horrid word beat upon the brain night and day. We watched the meals with an anxiety not born of appetite, and compared notes in the woodshed after dinner, keen to observe if there had been any falling off in quantity. The vision of an undiminished Saturday joint excited us to ecstasy; a piece of bread and butter less than usual plunged us into despair. We crept into one bed at night and lay close together, in the miserable conviction that we should not long have a bed to lie on."

Wide Asunder as the Poles. By Arthur Crump. (Longmans.)

If this is Mr. Crump's first book, it must be pronounced a very promising one indeed. It is too full of material, and accordingly lacks symmetry; there is also a great deal too much moralising in it on the part of the author, and his remarks are not always so original as he may imagine. But the book is interesting from first to last, the characters are well drawn and consistent with themselves, and the story is new. The author takes a very long time to get under weigh, but when he is at last fairly started the action is rapid enough. The first part of the book contains a very full, rather too full, account of Sweden and the Swedes. The greater portion of this part of the story is quite inessential; for after the hero has married his Swedish wife we hear no more of Sweden. The treatment she received in England at the hands of her husband was very bad, but in the end she was able to pay him back in full. One regrets that she did not err on the side of mercy. Mr. Crump does not explain how in the final scene Miss Muriel Wilcox manages to be present, yet we imagine that few things were impossible to that energetic young woman. There are little blanks in the story and some mistakes, but it has many good qualities.

A Tangled Garden. By Mrs. Fred Reynolds.
(Hutchinson & Co.)

If you are prepared to admit that a child of five will say to his father, "Tum on; zoo and I is men and must det to work," or "Farzer, if I lose zoo I lose my heart"; or that he will cry at the discovery that he has no mother, never having heard the word before, you will have one obstacle the less to the appreciation of Mrs. Fred Reynolds's story. The hero, too, grows a little tiresome. He is a man with a Past; and little Robin is its legacy. Pasts seem to spoil heroes as well as heroines. Dennis Ackroyd speaks much against Fate. But when a man has betrayed another man's wife, and is deliberately breaking a girl's heart, he has no right to complain if he finds the latter process a little irksome. He has still less right to lecture a better man than he on the errors of atheism. The story of the child's life and death is told with a simplicity which has its reward in an occasional pathos.

The Men of Harlech. By Wirt Gerrare.
(Ward & Downey.)

THE average novel reader taking up this book will probably lay it down in dismay after ten minutes. He will find it difficult to be interested in persons who spell their names Gwylm and Siancyn and Dafydd ap Evan ap Einion, and live at places like Gyffiliog and Cors-y-Gedol. He cannot easily transport himself to an epoch so unfamiliar as Wales during the Wars of the Roses. He will feel, and quite rightly, that the first part of the story is tedious beyond the necessary tediousness of explanations. All this is a pity, because there is a wholesome breeziness about Mr. Gerrare's tale of the old world. The reader who has patience till the beginning of the Siege of Harlech will certainly not lay down the book till the end. Whose pulse will not beat quicker as he reads of the first cannon which woke the echoes of Harlech, and the terror which it spread within the castle walls? And that flight under the escort of the uncanny Myfanwy, through bog and shifting sand, along underground passages and frightful caverns, on magic stones which no arrow can reach, down the river with a galley in close pursuit, is developed with an intensity worthy of Charles Reade. Everything that bloodshed and adventure and mystery can do to make our flesh creep Mr. Gerrare does. Next time he should remember we are not all Welsh.

Fortune's Fingers. By A. E. Wickham. (Hutchinson & Co.)

THIS book sets one thinking of what Charlotte Brontë might have done if she had lived in these days and been bred on shilling shockers. Divide Fortune's Fingers into two equal parts and you will find that the first is concerned with a friendless girl cast among strangers. She dwells in a vast lonely house with a master quite as eccentric as Mr. Rochester, but much less considerate. He extinguishes two candles because the third is enough to light the room, he deprives her of lunch because she looks "sulky," and he knocks her down because her spelling is defective. She is subject to nocturnal alarms just like Jane Eyre; and, like her, she is confronted with a mystery in the shape of her tyrant's wife, who has been tortured into imbecility. All that is interesting, but, one might say, old-fashioned. The gibe cannot apply to the second half of the volume. One morning Mr. Soleston, the monster, is found shot through the head. Suspicion falls on the heroine, who denies nothing, is tried, sentenced to death, and reprieved. Meanwhile Mrs. Soleston, the invalid, lies unconscious, but in a lucid interval before her death confesses that it was she, and not the girl, who killed her husband. There is a strong element of romance in the volume, which is exciting enough to win the thumb-mark of popular appreciation.

Lying Prophets. By Eden Phillpotts. (A. D. Innes & Co.)

IT is the centuries-old story that Mr. Eden Phillpotts tells: the man of the world, in this instance a painter, thirsting for a new experience; the shy, innocent girl, affianced to a rough sailor, who drinks in his honeyed words, and, trusting him implicitly, is robbed of her good name on the strength of a promise which it is never the intention of the artist to fulfil. Yet out of the old story the author has wrung a new significance, has revealed afresh the dignity of a woman's love, the misplaced loyalty, in face of the world, of which a woman's heart is capable. Joan Tregenza is a creditable if not a great creation. Half Celt, half Briton, speaking the dialect of the Newlyn fisher-folk and voicing their superstitions, her character is in harmony with her surroundings, and her figure stands out boldly against the wide stretch of sea whose waves beat upon the shores of her home. She is a child of nature, and to nature she turns in her great sorrow:

"Kind mother o' the flowers, doan't 'e forget a poor maiden what loves 'e so dear. I be sad an' sore-hearted, 'cause things is bad wi' me now Mister Jan's gone; an' I knaws as I've lied an' bin wicked 'bout Joe (her sailor lover); but, kind mother, I awnly done what Mister Jan, as was wise an' loved me, bid."

With relentless persistence Mr. Phillpotts traces the story of that nine months' tragedy to the end, an end involving the death of the artist who painted Joan, of Joan herself, and the mental wreckage of her father, an arch-puritan belonging to a strict sect of Methodists, who turned her from his door with curses. The book has many merits—scenes well described, conversations in a fascinating dialect naturally carried on, interesting legends interpolated; but it has an outstanding fault—its length. Cut down by nearly one half, Lying Prophets would be stronger and more enjoyable.

With Fortune Made. By Victor Cherbuliez. Translated by M. E. Simkins. (Hutchinson & Co.)

THE scene of M. Victor Cherbuliez' story is laid in Provence, the land where still linger fragments of old-world romance, superstition, and folk-wisdom, guarded, it may be, by the old Provençal tongue which remains on the lips of the peasantry. But in this uncompromisingly mundane novel there is no suggestion of these things: a less picturesque, perhaps a more ordinary, side of life is depicted. Briefly, the purpose of the book is to reveal the essential poverty of a man possessed only of much money. Riches cannot make rich; he only who has a rich nature and shares it with others can be accounted rich. These truths are brought home to Christopher Trayaz when, in old age, he says, pathetically, "I have toiled and toiled, I have sacrificed body and soul to heap up money, and my heart is breaking of melancholy and ennui." This picture of a large family settling upon a wealthy relative, as do flies on a dish of honey, treats of an infinitely small side of human nature, one despicably mean and sordid. Plot, counter-plot, calumny, back-biting, and an unending array of petty jealousies, flourish in the house of the multi-millionaire, but nothing more. Meanwhile, the central figure, before whom all cringe, laughs at the efforts of each one to undermine the influence of his fellow, and takes genuine interest only in an independent nephew who will have none of his patronage. Less ably presented, the mass of detail would be wearisome; even as it is, despite the skilful marshalling of facts, the reader asks where the elaboration of family genealogy is to stop. With Fortune Made is very creditably translated by M. E. Simkins. The characterisation is not profound, but Christopher Trayaz, his nephew, and the Uriah Heap-like steward, are faithful studies so far as they go.

The Queen's Cup. By G. A. Henty. In 3 vols. (Chatto & Windus.)

MR. HENTY takes some little time to get his craft under weigh for The Queen's Cup: the boat has to be built, so to say, her spars and rigging arranged, and she has to be manned. But once launched, she is borne swiftly along before a fair wind. Those who have read much fiction, it is true, gain a good idea of what will chance when they see her on the hulks: yet, if slightly built, she is a gallant little craft and sails well. Of variety the book has ample. The hero, Captain Mallett, takes part in the Indian Mutiny, and as a recompense for his noble deeds in the East the old friendship of Bertha Carew, after one false start, rounds the point of Love. At this stage, however, the villain begins his machinations in earnest, with the result that the gallant captain has to chase the rascal half round the world in order to regain possession of his coveted prize. There is much adventure, just enough love-making, and the story, admirable in its kind, is told breezily and in a straightforward way. The hero, a 'Varsity man, is not scrupulous as to grammar, and many of his phrases are annoyingly redundant, as, for instance, when he says, "It is years since our paths crossed each other." But these are faults easily forgiven.

A New Faust. By Alfred Smythe. (Digby, Long & Co.)

THE Devil is once more the favourite of fiction. He is popping up all over the place. Whether it is the example of Miss Marie Corelli, or the prevalence of esoteric "Satanism" on the Continent, or whether it is simply a new shudder, we forbear to inquire. At any rate, the poor deuce was not absolutely necessary for Mr. Smythe's purposes in his book, A New Faust, which turns rather on the magical properties to be discovered by an extension of modern science than on any moral conflict between good and evil. Dr. Jan van Hoff, who seeks and finds a form of electricity which, when materialised and injected into the blood, makes a man grow younger instead of older, brings in his Evil Spirit not so much by any necessity of the story as with a laudable desire to begin and end it in fireworks. Diabolus, like the "deus" of old, is brought in "ex machina" to raise Mr. Smythe's modern science just a step of weirdness above Mr. Grant Allen's natural magic.

The plot is the thing in Mr. Smythe's story. There is nothing particularly noticeable or new in the characters. Dr. Jan van Hoff, the specialist, discovers in his old age the modern counterpart of the Philosopher's Stone, an electric solution restoring youth to the blood. His discovery makes his old servant think him mad. His friend, Dr. Schloss, the scientist, tries to get him quietly into a handy asylum; and Van Hoff, very inconsiderately, gives himself away by attacking Schloss and hitting him over the head with a chair. That settles it, and Van Hoff becomes a prisoner in the Vaarlem Lunatic Asylum for twenty years, having, however, previously inoculated himself so that he grows younger every year. At the end of this time the scientist's young and lovely niece becomes a "visitor" at the asylum, and falls in love with the handsome lunatic, "Dr. Jenner," as Van Hoff had come to be called by the staff, to whom the only sign of madness he showed was his extraordinary medical skill. We need not follow the adventures associated with "Jenner's" escape by Stephanie's help, and the strange doings in Paris and Homburg when Van Hoff marries Stephanie, and makes use of his wonderful "electra." The interest in the story is well kept up, and the author has made the most of his idea. But his Faust is quite a moral man of science, and there is no Marguerite. It is not a tragedy, but a melodrama; and when Van Hoff at last breaks the spell and falls dead under the burden of the real years that he has lived, his young wife happily marries again.

FROM CROWDED SHELVES.

Hopkin's Pond, and Other Sketches. By Robert T. Morris. (Putnam.)

AS contributions to Forest and Stream we can imagine these papers to have been very welcome indeed. In such a journal one looks for something bright and interesting without too curiously examining the diction or style. But many an essay that looks attractive enough in a newspaper seems to lose charm when presented in a book, and one cannot help doubting whether these were worth collecting and republishing. At any rate, a more rigid test than the author's would have rejected a great number. "The Number Nine," for example, is merely trivial, and very little is to be said for the essay which gives the book its title. On the other hand, there are some slight sketches admirably done. That called "One Deer," when you take it to pieces, seems to contain nothing more than an unexciting story of the shooting of a buck. Yet, though it is done simply, the author manages in very few pages to reproduce the atmosphere—the very smoke of the camp-fire—from that lake at the Adirondacks. Mr. Morris has the gift—very rare in sporting writers—of reproducing the pleasures of the chase. English shooters, again, will be glad to read the three papers which he has devoted to as many aspects of the natural history of that most interesting game-bird the ruffed grouse. The fishing sketches are also, without exception, good; but the lucubration on "Wing Shooting v. Ground Shooting" only sets forth principles that are the A B C of English sportsmen. But it is the style that alarms. We accept with resignation the American spelling and the Yankee locutions, which, nevertheless, grate on the ear and offend the eye, but carelessness and inaccuracy are not so easily forgiven. In the fourth line and very first sentence of the preface you have to substitute "has" for "think" to make sense and grammar. When a little lower down the author congratulates himself thus, "I could turn to an old paper and find that I really had thought of nice things once," one wishes he had thought of a nicer way of expressing them. His hopeful feeling that "the pappus of the pen might float a tiny bit of germ to some barren office desk" is to be respected, but a use of simpler language would have rendered fulfilment more probable. For when Mr. Morris would be clever, thus he writes: "That rock's awash aswash. Tighter draws the mussel on his byssus. The seeping barnacles make merry and clap their valves. . . . The lolling pilage of wrack lifts up a sign for help." At times, too, he talks of "cyclefuls of generations"; and is not this "the terrific diction" applied to scenery?—"A quiet spring . . . pours heaps of canorous water pell-mell through a forty-mile chute, straight into diaphanic Lake Superior." This is certainly not the style in which Thoreau wrote his Walden, or that in which Mr. Burroughs has won distinction. As a final word, let us beg of the author, should he write a second volume, not to drop into any more poetry—his appendix of verses calls for no other comment. We point out these faults the more frankly because our author is full of matter interesting alike to the naturalist and the sportsman.

* * *

The Yellow Book: January. (John Lane.) THIS fantastic quarterly does not grow in strength or beauty. It lacks a policy, a central idea, and has become merely an agglomeration of pictures and stories, all of which might appear with equal propriety elsewhere; whereas once—once things were not so; once The Yellow Book was a fighter in a definite, meritorious cause, and contributors were proud to believe that their work was unlikely to be accepted by Mr. Harland's fellow editors. These remarks, it is true, have been applicable to more than one of the recent issues of The Yellow Book, but they fit the present January volume with peculiar ease; for not only is there this striking want of a controlling scheme, but the level of excellence of both literature and art is very low. With the exception of Mr. Henry James's study of George Sand's bewildering temperament and Dr. Garnett's experiment in grotesque (which, however, is not in his best manner: not equal to "The Demon Pope," for example, or "The Poet of Panopolis"), there is nothing of the first class; and certain pieces, such as "The Unka," and "Natalie," and "A Little Holiday," have hardly enough merit upon which to base any defence of their inclusion. As for the pictures, they are too poor to be noticed seriously at all, with the exception of Mr. Walton's portrait of Miss Evelyn Sharp. Mr. Henry James is pre-eminently the critic in whose hands may be left the final word as to the suitability of making public the whole story of the relations of George Sand and Alfred de Musset. Mr. James has already written of both the actors in this tragi-comedy; he knows their work through and through; he is a master of subtle analysis; he understands tolerance. From so closely reasoned an article it is difficult to quote, but these sentences may be extracted: "The matter with them [George Sand and Musset], to the perception of the stupefied spectator, is that they entertained for each other every feeling in life but the feeling of respect." . . . "To feel as Mme. Sand felt, however, one had to be, like Mme. Sand, a man; which poor Musset was far from being." For the rest, there are poems by Mr. William Watson, Mr. Stephen Phillips, and Mr. Bernard Miall; a story, deft but wanting, we think, in sincerity, by Mr. Harland; a fairy tale, in the manner of Wynns, by Miss Evelyn Sharp; and a sombre study of a death-bed by Mr. John Buchan. The first of Mr. Le Gallienne's prose fancies reads like a travesty of himself.

A Hero of the Dark Continent: Memoir of Rev. W. A. Scott, Church of Scotland Missionary at Blantyre, B.C.A. By W. Henry Rankine, B.D., Minister at St. Boswells. (Blackwoods.)

THE Rev. W. Affleck Scott was a hero rather in the Sunday-school sense than in the wider acceptance of the word; and we mean this neither as flout nor as jibe. He was quite frankly a religious lad and young man, who yet was fond of games and "larks," as every young man should be, however religious. He very creditably passed through his course of study at school and college, and thereafter took both theology and medicine in order to qualify as "a medical missionary." He went to British Central Africa, to Blantyre in the Shiré Highlands, and, after six years or so of hard, unselfish, and admirable work for the Church of Scotland and the natives of British Central Africa, he died. His story is not of wide interest, though his memory may quite properly be cherished by his friends and by the kirk, nor has the presentation of it any claim to be regarded as literature. The minister of St. Boswells has little or no knack that way. This is the kind of sentence that the Rev. Mr. Rankine perpetrates: ". . . a band of from fifteen to twenty members, composed to all appearance of what are termed ragamuffins when the souls of men are valued by the bodily appearance." Are we not permitted to call a drove of ragged lads "ragamuffins," whatever test of value we may apply to the souls of men? Mr. W. A. Scott was by way of being something of a draughtsman, and two or three of his drawings are reproduced; also, he had a vein of facetiousness of the variety known in the North as "wut," sundry specimens of which his biographer cruelly quotes. His letters have a kind of fierce vivacity, but otherwise are singularly uninteresting save to the few who may care about his religious opinions. His best letter is that which he proposed to call "Fourteen Days on the Kwakwa in an Arab Dhow"; it is distinctly amusing, though the joke of it comes to be laboured and over-wrought. To the end Mr. W. A. Scott, with many admirable and some charming qualities, was remarkably boyish and quite wonderfully raw.

Letters Historical and Archæological on the Isle of Wight. By the Rev. E. Boucher James. (Henry Frowde.)

THE Isle of Wight would at first sight appear to be a delightful hunting-ground for the antiquary and the historian, lying as it does midway along our southern coast, and favoured by climate and conformation for invasion and colonisation. But this notwithstanding, its history is singularly devoid of incident, and its surface poor in archæological remains, as compared with neighbouring counties. It is not surprising, therefore, that its historians have served up again and again the same material, only slightly disguised by their own flavouring. It was, consequently, with no great expectancy that one took up the two volumes, extending to some 1,400 pages of letters, historical and archæological, on the Island, from the pen of the late Vicar of Carisbrooke, the Rev. E. Boucher James, letters which had previously done duty in a local paper. The advantages of erudition, social position, a fluent pen, and residence in the most interesting spot in the island, have not produced much that is novel. The author has been too much attracted by the fascination of the remote past, and too little by an interesting present, concerning which he might have been a worthy historian. Until within very recent years the islanders have been a most stay-at-home race, and among the older inhabitants there must be information respecting a mass of interesting folklore and customs, which will soon be a matter of tradition now that railways have everywhere seamed the Island's surface. Then, again, we have the country life of the late Poet Laureate, with whom the author was on terms of intimacy, and which would have been of more than ephemeral interest. As it is, the volumes have reached their present bulk by the insertion of papers on events which have often only a slight, and sometimes no local interest, and others where nine-tenths have nothing to do with the Island. For instance, the incident of the Dutch Fleet under William of Orange slackening sail off the island for Divine service in 1687, an incident which in itself occupies but half a page, is utilised for two papers extending to close on a score pages. So again Fielding's having to put into Ryde from stress of weather on his voyage to Lisbon is material for papers on "The Island a Century Ago" and "A Voyage in Search of Health." Again, papers on the "Scene of Charles I.'s Execution and his Exhumation" have nothing to do with the Island. A point is made in the preface that the volumes have been edited by more than one competent person. How, then, do we account for the insertion of an account of the Isle of Wight Transit Company? a lamentable failure a dozen years ago, but which is entitled "a venture to which great hopes of success are attached." Compressed into one volume the work would have been a valuable one; as it is, its expansiveness has seriously affected its value.

Book Prices Current. Edited by J. H. Slater. Vol. X. (Elliot Stock.)

THE editor of this useful work is alive to the need of making it an easy one to consult in the shop or the saleroom. To this end a subject-index is now added, and the general index is fuller and better displayed than hitherto. The latter shows, by means of asterisks, what entries have been annotated by the editor. It appears, from Mr. Slater's interesting Introduction, that from December, 1895, to November, 1896—the period covered by this volume—47,000 lots of books have changed hands at the average price of £1 13s. 10d. per lot. In 1893 the average price was £1 6s. 7d., and Mr. Slater attributes the steady rise to improvement in trade generally and also in the quality of the books offered. At the same time it is to be considered that the generous average for 1896 is partly due to a small and special leaven of extremely valuable books fetching sensational prices. Thus two copies of Chaucer's Canterbury Tales, printed by Caxton about 1478, brought between them nearly three thousand pounds. We note, without poignant regret, that large-paper and limited editions of contemporary writers have declined in value—in fact, have "totally vanished."

Famous British Warships and their Commanders. By Walter Wood. (Hurst & Blackett.)

THERE are stories which can hardly be marred in the telling, and this book is full of such; it is not the less to the author's credit that he has told them well. His aim has been to relate the stories of England's great naval victories in terms of ships and men. We are always on shipboard. "The Revenge and Sir Richard Grenville," "The Centurion and Lord Anson," "The Triumph and Admiral Blake," "The Formidable and Lord Rodney"—such is the pattern of Mr. Wood's fourteen chapter-titles. But he says it was no easy task to collect details of men-of-war. A ship of war does not, like a regiment, blazon her past honours on a flag of her own; and Mr. Wood endorses Commander Robinson's suggestion that this privilege should be extended to the navy. However, the author has done very well with his materials. His narratives stir the blood. Here is one concerning Lord Howe's action on the First of June. The French thought there would be no fight—

"When, between seven and eight o'clock on that memorable Sunday morning, the fleets being about four miles apart and going parallel in line of battle, Howe hove to and gave the men their breakfasts, Captain Troubridge, an English prisoner on the French Sans Pareil, was taunted with the remark that 'there will be no fight to-day, your admiral will not venture down.' The Englishman told his captors to wait a bit: 'English sailors never like to fight on empty stomachs,' he said. 'I see the signal flying for all hands to breakfast, after which, take my word for it, they will pay you a visit.' The visit was paid, and the Sans Pareil was towed off to England."

There are dozens of such anecdotes that one would fain transcribe for sheer delight in them.

Tobacco Talk and Smoker's Gossip. (George Redway.)

THIS collection of tobacco stories reaches its seventh thousand in the pocket edition (printed in green ink, and bound in scarlet) which lies before us. We turn with special interest to those which combine the flavours of tobacco and literature—how well these have always combined! The editor reminds us on p. 38 of the disconcerting fact that Shakespeare—he, the myriad-minded—never once mentions tobacco. Nothing can console the smoker for this. One thanks Spenser, who called tobacco "divine," and Ben Jonson, who declared it "the most sovereign and precious weed that ever the earth tendered to the use of man." But one remains angry and regretful at the great omission. True it is that Shakespeare could not have made any of his characters smoke without an anachronism; but we have forgiven him worse—and Polonius cries for a pipe. Milton, be it remembered, smoked his pipe and drank a glass of water with it before retiring. Lamb's pipe, Thackeray's cigar, Tennyson's churchwarden are here, and many another mighty instrument of thought and fancy; but the editor wisely sautes his book with some stories against smokers. We had not met before with the one about Mr. Swinburne, who, finding every room at the Arts Club filled with smokers, delivered himself aloud as follows: "James I. was a knave, a tyrant, a fool, a liar, a coward; but I love him, I worship him, because he slit the throat of that blackguard Raleigh, who invented this filthy smoking."

The Persuasive Hand, and Other Sayings and Essayings. By the Author of Times and Days. (Chiswick Press.)

THIS is a feeble attempt in pensée writing. A successful pensée suggests that its author has given us the wisdom of fifty thoughts in one. Its perfect style should seem to come from the heat of that fusion. But here the thoughts are mere single thoughts, commendable but loose. Many are the mere commonplaces of talk: "You must go abroad to know the taste of home"; "Luxury is a poor equivalent for comfort"; "How a joke flouts you if you tell it to some one who does not appreciate it." Others are ambitiously futile: "There is more sadness in the world than children know of"; "Love at first sight is only the heart bursting its dam." We like the "only." In other of his thoughts the author expresses a grudge against success; but even his bitterness is not convincing. Best we like the following: "There is a close affinity between minds. Every book seems to me to be little more than a plagiarism from my unwritten MS. When it is not, it is not worth reading."

Poems by Matthew Arnold. Selected and Edited by G. C. Macaulay. (Macmillans.)

THIS, a new volume of "Macmillans' English Classics," is, we believe, the first collection of the poems of Matthew Arnold which has been prepared for the use of schoolboys. Granted that nothing can be too good to assist the young mind to excellence, we have little but praise for this book; yet we are by no means assured that it is prudent to lay such an exquisite poem as, say, "The Forsaken Merman" before a scholar whose sense of poetical beauty was but recently awakened. This sense being one that only time and age can rightly develop, it follows that to offer to children poems of such maturity of thought and perfection of style as many of Arnold's is to overtax their comprehension in a way that may mean disappointment in the future. And Matthew Arnold, it must be remembered, was weary and disillusioned, and he wrote for men in like plight; schoolboys are not weary or disillusioned. Mr. Macaulay, however, has chosen poems less of a reflective character than narrative and descriptive; although "Dover Beach," "A Southern Night" and "Rugby Chapel" are among the inclusions. He explains the omission of "Sohrab and Rustum," which we should have thought would have been his first choice. The notes are interesting: boys who are intending to proceed from school to Oxford will never regret the fulness with which "Thyrsis" and "The Scholar-Gipsy" are treated.

ACADEMY PORTRAITS.

XIII.—S. T. COLERIDGE.

COLERIDGE is (with the exception of Pope) perhaps the only poet who was a genius to his schoolfellows—and, more wonderful still, to his schoolmaster. At Christ's Hospital his Greek and philosophy were things sensational to all. How he afterwards left Oxford and enlisted, how he made an indifferent trooper and was bought out, how he came in contact with Southey and later with Wordsworth; of the Pantisocratic scheme and its failure; of the "Lyrical Ballads" and their failure, Macaulay's schoolboy would think it trite to speak. Those were the golden days of the "Ancient Mariner" and "Christabel"; the days when even women like Dorothy Wordsworth sat entranced while the young man eloquent poured out talk the report of which is immortal. Of that Coleridge one could wish a Sargent or Watts to have left us a portrait, which would have settled, for one thing, whether his eyes were brown, as one observer says, or gray as others declare—though it is by a curious error that even De Quincey attaches to him the famous line of Wordsworth about the "noticeable man with large gray eyes." Then came ill-health and opium. Laudanum by the wineglassful and half-pint at a time soon reduced him to the journalist lecturer and philosopher who projected all things, executed nothing; only the eloquent tongue left. So he perished—the mightiest intellect of his day; and great was the fall thereof. There remain of him his poems, and a quantity of letters painful to read. They show him wordy, full of weak lamentation, deplorably feminine and strengthless.

* As De Quincey himself shows elsewhere, the passage in question refers probably to Sir Humphry Davy—certainly not to Coleridge.

No other poet, perhaps, except Spenser, has been an initial influence, a generative influence, on so many poets. Having with that mild Elizabethan much affinity, it is natural that he also should be "a poets' poet" in the rarer sense—the sense of fecundating other poets. As with Spenser, it is not that other poets have made him their model, have reproduced essentials of his style (accidents no great poet will consciously perpetuate). The progeny are sufficiently unlike the parent. It is that he has incited the very sprouting in them of the laurel-bough, has been to them a fostering sun of song. Such a primary influence he was to Rossetti—Rossetti, whose model was far more Keats than Coleridge. Such he was to Coventry Patmore, in whose work one might trace many masters rather than Coleridge. "I did not try to imitate his style," said that great singer who has but just passed from us.

"I can hardly explain how he influenced me: he was rather an ideal of perfect style than a model to imitate; but in some indescribable way he did influence my development more than any other poet."

No poet, indeed, has been senseless enough to imitate the inimitable. One might as well try to paint air as to catch a style so void of all manner that it is visible, like air, only in its results. All other poets have not only a style, but a manner; not only style, but features of style. The style of Coleridge is bare of manner, without feature, not "distinguishable in member, joint, and limb"; it is, in the Roman sense of merum, mere style; style unalloyed and integral. Imitation has no foothold; it would tread on glass. Therefore poets, diverse beyond other men in their appreciation of poets, have agreed with a single mind in their estimate of this poet; no artist could refrain his homage to the miracle of such utterance. To the critic has been left the peculiar and purblind shame of finding eccentricity in this speech unflawed. It seems beyond belief; yet we could point to an edition of Coleridge, published during his lifetime, and preceded by a would-be friendly memoir, which justifies our saying: "Be thou as chaste as ice, as pure as snow, thou shalt not escape calumny." The admiring critic complains of Mr. Coleridge's affectations and wilful fantasticalness of style; and he dares to cite as example that wonderfully perfect union of language and metre:

"The night is chill, the forest bare;
Is it the wind that moaneth bleak?
There is not wind enough in the air
To move away the ringlet curl
From the lovely lady's cheek—
There is not wind enough to twirl
The one red leaf, the last of its clan,
That dances as often as dance it can,
Hanging so light, and hanging so high,
On the topmost twig that looks up at the sky."

Critics, wrapped in "cock-sureness," to warn, not to discourage you; poets, branded with affectation, to give you heart, not recklessness; we recall the fact that this lovely passage was once thought affected and fantastic. There is not one great poet who has escaped the charge of obscurity, fan-tasticalness, or affectation of utterance. It was hurled, at the outset of their careers, against Coleridge, Wordsworth, Shelley, Keats, Tennyson, Browning. Wordsworth wrote simple diction, and his simplicity was termed affected; Shelley gorgeous diction, and his gorgeousness was affected; Keats rich diction, and his richness was affected; Tennyson cunning diction, and his cunning was affected; Browning rugged diction, and his ruggedness was affected. Why Coleridge was called affected passes the wit of man, except it be that he did not write like Pope or the elegant Mr. Rogers—or, indeed, that all critical tradition would be outraged if a mere recent poet were not labelled with the epithet made and provided for him by wise critical precedent. If this old shoe were not thrown at the wedding of every poet with the Muse, what would become of our ancient English customs?

But critic and poet, lion and lamb, have now lain down together in their judgment of Coleridge; and abundance of the most excellent appreciation has left no new word about him possible. The critic, it is to be supposed, feels much the same delicacy in praising a live poet as in eulogising a man to his face: when the poet goes out of the room, so to speak, and the door of the tomb closes behind him, the too sensitive critic breathes freely, and finds vent for his suppressed admiration. For the last thirty years criticism has unburdened its suppressed feelings about Coleridge, which it considerably spared him while he was alive; and his position is clear, unquestioned; his reputation beyond the power of wax or wane. Alone of modern poets, his fame sits above the power of fluctuation. Wordsworth has fluctuated; Tennyson stands not exactly as he did; there is reaction in some quarters against the worship of Shelley; though all are agreed Keats is a great poet, not all are agreed as to his place. But around Coleridge the clamour of partisans is silent: none attacks, none has need to defend. "The Ancient Mariner," "Christabel," "Kubla Khan," "Genevieve" are recognised as perfectly unique masterpieces of triumphant utterance, and triumphant imagination of a certain kind. They bring down magic to the earth. Shelley has followed it to the skies; but not all can companion him in that rarefied ether and breathe. Coleridge brings it in to us, floods us round with it, makes it native and apprehensible as the air of our own earth. To do so he seeks no remote splendours of language, uses no brazier of fuming imagery. He waves his wand, and the miracle is accomplished before our eyes in the open light of day; he takes words which have had the life used out of them by the common cry of poets, puts them into relation, and they rise up like his own dead mariners, wonderful with a supernatural animation. The poems take the reason prisoner, and the spell is renewed as often as they are read. The only question on which critics differ is the respective places of the two longer poems. "The Ancient Mariner" has the advantage of completion, and its necromancy is performed, so to speak, more in the sight of the reader, with a more absolutely simple diction, and a simpler metre. The apparatus—if we may use such a degrading image—is less. “Christabel” is not only a fragment, but incapable of being anything else. Not even Coleridge, we do believe, could have maintained through the intricacies of plot and in dénouement the expectations aroused by the opening. The second part, as has been said, declines its level in portions. Yet, in opposition to the general opinion, we think that a more subtle magic is effected in the first part than in the “Ancient Mariner”—marvellous though that be. The “Ancient Mariner” passes in a region of the supernatural; “Christabel” brings the supernatural into the regions of everyday. Nor can we see, as some critics have seen, any flaw in the success with which this is done. Yet, perhaps, there are a few—chiefly poetic—readers to whom the most unique and enthralling achievement of all is “Kubla Khan.” The words, the music—one and indivisible—come through the gates of dream as never has poem come before or since. This, we believe, might have been completed, so far as a dream is ever completed; that is to say, there might have been more of it. Obviously, the thing has no plot, difficult sustainedly to execute. It is pure lyricism; and the tapestry of shifting vision might unroll indefinitely to the point at which the dream melted. For, unlike many, we have no difficulty in believing Coleridge’s account of how the poem arose. We should feel it difficult to believe any other origin. We could no more see a shower without postulating a cloud than we could doubt this poem to have been rained out of dream. If there were a day of judgment against the preventers of poetry, heavy would be the account of that unnamed visitor who interrupted Coleridge in the transcription of his dream-music, and lost to the world for ever the remainder of “Kubla Khan.” In the other world, we trust, this wretched individual will be condemned eternally to go out of ear-shot when the angels prelude on their harps; together with all those who by choice enter concert-rooms during the divinest passage of a symphony.

The minor poems of this great poet are minor indeed. “Youth and Age,” “Frost at Midnight,” passages of “The Nightingale,” and one or two more which might be named, in spite of a real measure of quiet beauty, could never support a great reputation. The “Ode to Dejection” has unquestionably fine passages, but hardly aims at sustained power. The Odes “To France” and “The Departing Year” are terrible bombast, though here again occur fine lines. The fingers of one hand number the poems on which Coleridge’s fame is adamantly based; and they were all written in about two years of his youth.

The portrait which accompanies this notice shows the Coleridge of those younger days, with the poet not yet burned out in him; when we are told his face had beauty in the eyes of many women. It is of the later Coleridge that we possess the most luminous descriptions. A slack, shambling man, flabby in face and form and character, redeemed by noble brow and dim yet luminous eyes; womanly and unstayed of nature, torrentuous of golden talk, the poet submerged and feebly struggling in opium-darkened oceans of German philosophy, amid which he finally foundered, striving to the last to fish up gigantic projects from the bottom of a daily half-pint of laudanum. And over that wreck, most piteous and terrible in all our literary history, shines, and will shine for ever, the five-pointed star of his glorious youth; those poor five resplendent poems, for which he paid the devil’s price of a desolated life and unthinkably blasted powers. Other poets may have done greater things; none a thing more perfect and unaccompanied. Other poets belong to this class or that; he to the class of Samuel Taylor Coleridge.

FRANCIS THOMPSON.

PARIS LETTER.

(From our French Correspondent.)

EXQUISITE French, perfect style, an indescribable delicacy of touch and subtlety of irony—in a word, every distinct and elusive quality that go to make up that supreme word “charm.” And having said so much of M. Anatole France’s new book, L’Orme du Mail, how far away one is from having said enough! M. France is an enchanter. His style, like Renan’s, has the aroma, the mellowness that long pondering gives to thought when it reaches expression, and which can only be compared with the full-toned flavour of old wine. It has nothing in common with the poetic prose of great prosateurs like Rousseau, Bernadon de St. Pierre, Sand, de Staël, or our Ruskin. Rarer still, more precious, more quaint, of the most elegant and limpid simplicity, it is luminous with the mild and tempered tones of late afternoon sunshine: nothing garish, nothing sublime, impassioned, or resplendent. But for a charm so penetrative, an irony so delicious, a perfection so incomparable, all the eloquence of the century might be bartered.

A smile, transparently ingenuous and human, runs through the book, from cover to cover, softening the natural asperities of satire, winning pardon for the little inoffensive touches of rakishness, effacing all deformities of vice and perfidy. From the Puritan point of view, such a book, it must be confessed, is decidedly immoral, because of the glamour and fascination it can cast over any character or scene, however perverse or shady. To begin with, M. France dots no i’s. He suggests with delicately playful gravity. So inimitable is his art, that we delight in the frailty and imperfection of humanity, for the charming occasions for wit and subtlety frailty and imperfection furnish him with. What could be more engaging than his exposure of insincerity in the Cardinal-Archbishop in the opening chapter? All his little flatteries and devices to ward off the inevitable accusation, which is the object of the Abbé Lantaigne’s visit, obtain our sympathy through the road of humour and skill. When the fatal name is introduced, he asks, with assumed levity, if M. l’Abbé Guitrel is a candidate for a bishopric, and the austere Abbé Lantaigne indignantly exclaims that such a nomination would be as great a scandal as that of Cautinus, who so unworthily filled the chair of St. Martin. “Cautinus,” said the good-natured Cardinal-Archbishop (who heard the name for the first time)—“Cautinus, that occupied St. Martin’s seat! Are you quite sure that the conduct of this Cautinus was as bad as they say?” and thereupon the innocent abbé is dragged away from his project. But he returns to it, and this time accuses his rival of buying church objects for the benefit of a Jewess, the prefect’s wife, who covers “seats they tell me are called puffs” with brocaded copes.

“Puffs,” muses the Cardinal; “but if the appropriation of these ornaments, no longer in use, was lawfully made, I cannot see that the Bishop Cautinus—I mean the Abbé Guitrel—did any wrong in taking part in this legitimate transaction. There is no reason to venerate the copes of pious curates as relics of the saints. It is no sacrilege to sell their cast-off vestments to make puffs.”

And when he has got rid of the discontented abbé, he says to his secretary:

“M. Lantaigne is sincerity itself. I esteem his frankness and his honesty. With him you know where you are going, and,” he added, “where you will go.”

Inimitable the abbé’s letter of accusation against his enemy. Here is the fourth charge:

“M. Guitrel is in the habit of going every day, at five o’clock in the afternoon, to Dame Magloire’s confectionery shop, Place Saint Exupère, and there, leaning over the counters, the sideboards and tables, he examines the dainties massed on the plates and in the dishes with a deep interest and a laborious assiduity. Then stopping at the spot where those sorts of cakes, which, I am informed, are called éclairs and babas, are piled, he touches one of these confections with his finger’s edge, then another, and orders these trifles to be wrapped in a sheet of paper. Far from me be it to accuse him of sensuality because of this minute and absurd choice of a few cream cakes and sweets. But if we consider that he goes to Dame Magloire’s at the very hour when the fashionable class of both sexes crowds there, and that he offers himself for public laughter, we may ask ourselves if the Professor of Eloquence of the great seminary does not leave some of his dignity at the confectioner’s. As a fact, the choice of two cakes has not escaped ill-natured attention, and, rightly or wrongly, they say that M. Guitrel keeps one for himself and gives the other to his servant. Assuredly he may, without incurring blame, share dainties with a person attached to his service, above all if this person has attained the canonical age.”

The relations between the prefect and his wife, both Jews, and the Abbé Guitrel are suggested with finished and delicious irony. Too subtle and perfect an artist to weigh upon a stroke, or punctuate a delicate idea, M. France’s satire is as good-humoured as it is polished. It is the perfection of the high urbane French manner. If it scratches, to the tip of the nails, with their sharpness of point and certainty of tear, the hand is sheathed in soft and perfumed velvet. There is neither sneer nor brilliancy in the mild, false smile, no obvious claim in the charming grace of attitude. He seeks no more elaborate effect upon his reader than a pervasive glow, a delicate feeling of contentment, and this by an equable radiance and a temperate fluency. When the cardinal stoops to a practical joke, it is an eminently austere and erudite one, and when he has fooled the unfortunate abbé to the top of his learned bent he says grandly, "You have rendered me an inappreciable service, M. Lantaigne; know that I greatly esteem your sciences and receive my pastoral blessing." And the abbé, learning of the trick, cries, lifting his sombre and ardent glance to heaven: "The archbishop deceived me! Will that man, then, never tell the truth except at the altar steps when holding the sacred host he pronounces the words 'Domine non sum dignus!'"

But it is not in two columns that such an enchanting book as L'Orme du Mail can be adequately treated, nor the tenth part of its beauties, its ineffable grace and quiet unanalysable charm revealed. It is a book to make us thankful for our times.

NOTES AND NEWS.

THE third volume of The Centenary Burns, edited by Messrs. Henley and Henderson, will be published immediately. The Notes, extending to over 200 pages, will contain much novel information about the origin of Burns's songs, from authentic and hitherto unknown MSS. (in the possession of the Earl of Rosebery, the Earl of Crawford and Balcarres, and others), and various important sources wholly unutilised by earlier editors.

THE proposal to erect a gas-lamp to the memory of the late Mr. Stevenson, because in Virginibus Puerisque and The Child's Garden of Verse he wrote on lamps and lamp-posts, affords one a beautiful glimpse into the mind of the man who made it. It is evidently a nice mind; but this Stevenson gas-lamp would be extinguished by the laughter of all whose naïveté is not unlimited. Better far proclaim that every lamp-post is henceforth a monument to Stevenson. This would save us from seeing a chimney erected to Charles Lamb, because he wrote of chimney-sweepers.

In the Contemporary Review Mr. Edmund Gosse tells the inner history of the late Coventry Patmore's mystical work, Sponsa Dei. It was written between 1881 and 1883, and Mr. Patmore had arranged with Mr. Gosse to publish the book at a certain time after his death. But an extraordinary incident put an end to this plan. "On January 30, 1888," says Mr. Gosse, "when I had been staying a day or two with Patmore at Hastings he said to me at breakfast, abruptly, almost hysterically, 'You won't have much to do as my literary executor!' and then proceeded to announce that he had burned the entire MS. of Sponsa Dei on the previous Christmas Day. His family knew nothing of this holocaust, and the ladies immediately cried, 'O papa, that is why you have been so dreadfully depressed since Christmas!'"

"He had come to the conclusion that, although wholly orthodox, and proceeding no further than the Bible and the Breviary permitted, the world was not ready for so mystical an interpretation of the significance of physical love in religion, and that some parts of the book were too daring to be safely placed in all hands. . . . The subject of it was certainly surprising. It was not more nor less than an interpretation of the love between the soul and God by an analogy of the love between a woman and a man; it was, indeed, a transcendental treatise on Divine desire seen through the veil of human desire. The purity and crystalline passion of the writer carried him safely over the most astounding difficulties, but perhaps, on the whole, he was right in considering that it should not be thrown to the vulgar. Yet the scruple which destroyed it was simply deplorable; the burning of Sponsa Dei involved a distinct loss to literature."

THE theory of the American Shakespearean scholar, Mr. Locke Richardson, that when Falstaff "babbled o' green fields," he was recalling the "green pastures" of the twenty-third Psalm, has moved J. G. A. to address to Falstaff the following lines, which are published in the Critic. So much interest is shown in this country in this new reading of Shakespeare that we quote the poem:

"FALSTAFF DYING.

"They say that Falstaff, dying, turned his eyes
From life's buffooneries and dreary mirth—
Knowing he went the way of all the earth,—
And babbled—mark his comrade's dazed surprise!—
Of pastures green, within the land that lies Beyond the utmost bound of old World's girth.
Didst rave, old Knight? Didst seek, amid the dearth
Of earthly comfort, one that never dies?
O tender thought! O sweet solution rare!
His groping spirit sprung from God's good seed—
Might he not turn, in this, his last, dread need,
To childhood's teaching of that Country fair
Which seemed so strangely near, now life was done?
E'en let us grant him this, his race being run!"

In the current Century Magazine is an interesting biographical sketch of Samuel Lover, by his daughter, Mrs. Fanny Schmid. Lover died just about a generation ago, so that it is neither too soon nor too late to revive the memory of his very various talents. By a great many people he is remembered only as the author of Handy Andy, a book which shares with Valentine Vox the honour of having made thousands of readers laugh for the first time over print. But Lover was a very all round man. As a miniaturist he might have taken high rank. He was overwhelmed with orders for portraits when he exchanged Dublin for London, and it is interesting to learn that among the famous and beautiful faces he portrayed was that of the venerable Mrs. Gwynne, the "Jessamy Bride" of Goldsmith.

LOVER also wrote songs which sold well; he played several musical instruments; and in society "Sam Lover," or "little Lover," was a prime favourite. Yet at home he was everything to his wife and daughter; in short, says Mrs. Schmid, he lived up to his own verse:

"Oh! thus I'd play th' enchanter's part,
Thus scatter bliss around,
And not a tear nor aching heart
Should in the world be found!"

Later in life his eyes suffered by his painting and etching, and he undertook entertainments which he called "Lover's Irish Evenings." They were excellent fun. Royalties from his works flowed in pleasantly, and a Royal pension for his literary achievements capped all. "On the last morning of his life," says his daughter, "he rose as usual." He who would be happy though an author should learn of Lover.

THOSE who know their De Quincey and remember his wonderful account of the great snowstorm at the beginning of the century, will be interested in learning that Mrs. Hall, of Grasmere, the youngest of those children whose parents perished in that storm, died at Grasmere last week, at the age of 92.

SOME readers are far too inquisitive. In the current number of Nature Notes, the organ of the Selborne Society, an inquirer writes to ask: "What is the poison-flower mentioned in the Sorrows of Satan, chap. xxvi., 'the poison-flower which, brilliant in colour and perfect in shape, exhales death to those who pluck it from its stem'?" To this the editor dryly replies: "We do not know the 'poison-flower,' and former attempts to obtain enlightenment as to the plants described in Miss Corelli's books have proved unsuccessful (see N.N. 1896, p. 213). We presume, however, that the flower in question belongs to the same class as the 'bog-oak' of Miss Corelli's Mighty Atom."

In the second part of his penny Poems for the Schoolroom and the Scholar the influence of his journalistic training is strong upon Mr. Stead, or more properly, upon his assistant, Mr. R. S. Wood. Indeed, never was poetry so be-journalised as it is here. One would have thought, for instance, that if there was one piece of writing in the world which would never be subjected to the indignity of "cross-headings," it was Matthew Arnold's "Forsaken Merman." But to think so is to reckon without the colossal enterprise of Mr. Stead. Mr. Stead can put cross-headings to anything; he puts eight to this particular poem, in the following order: "The Children call for their Mother"—"But no Response is made by Her"—"They have Heard the Bell Call"—"Why the Mother left Them"—"They go to the Church in Search of their Mother"—"They hear the Mother Singing: She heeds Them Not"—"The Mother never Returns"—"How Lonely are the Kings of the Sea."

"JOHN GILPIN" is treated similarly, although the child who cannot follow Cowper's story unadorned cannot comprehend Mr. Stead's aids to intelligence. But when it comes to Browning's "Pied Piper of Hamelin" there is real occasion for an editor, for only a portion of the poem is given, and the title is altered to the "Pied Piper's Revenge." We gather that this is so because Mr. Stead could not gain the permission of the publishers to print the piece intact. But if they could have foreseen, surely Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co. would have granted him full permission, since anything is better than such mutilation. Mr. Stead seems destined to be a source of irritation in Waterloo-place.

MR. RUSKIN'S Stones of Venice has been translated into Hungarian. The translation will be published by the Hungarian Academy of Sciences. The first part has already appeared in print.

LADY PRESTWICH, who is collecting material for A Life of the late Sir Joseph Prestwich, will be grateful to friends if they will forward to her any letters, addressing them to Shoreham, near Sevenoaks. These will be at once copied and carefully returned.

THE writer of a good article on "Literature and Music" in the new Macmillan is amusingly severe on those writers who have shown by their mistakes that a little knowledge of music is a dangerous thing. Mr. Marion Crawford, it seems, has ascribed La Favorita to Verdi; Mr. Black has been found setting a lady down to a piano to play Beethoven's Farewell—"a composition unknown to that musician's many admirers"; while the late Charles Reade, after making Peg Woffington whistle a quick tune, tells how Mr. Cibber was astonished by "this sparkling adagio." In the opinion of the writer of the article few literary men have shown a more intelligent interest in music than De Quincey. Johnson failed on the flageolet; Goethe and Carlyle understood the value of music, but had no passion for it; Scott had neither voice nor ear, but some taste; Burns had an ear and even a fiddle; Lamb no ear; and Coleridge had no ear, but much taste—a position which he declared to be quite possible.

It is quite time that the fly-away Neo-Celtic movement in literature should be lassoed and put to a task. One is glad, therefore, that Mr. Andrew Lang thinks so, and that he writes as follows in the current Blackwood:

"If the Neo-Celts are in earnest, let them provide us with Celtic texts and literal translations of Celtic literature, or do for Ireland, Brittany, and Wales what Mr. Neil Munro has begun to do for the West Highlands. This is the path; to make large claims of the best things in English literature, or in French heroism, for 'the Celtic element' is not the path. Conscious modern imitation of poetry which the imitators, as a rule, cannot read in the original languages, is not the path. These proceedings irritate the so-called Saxon, provoke his ridicule, and keep alive his prejudices. It is foolish to call Jeanne d'Arc or Walter Scott 'Celts'; foolish to say that a poet must have Celtic blood because, in fact, you like his poetry."

This is Saxon common-sense.

MR. HUGH PRICE HUGHES sends the following reply—a little belated—to the request which we sent out asking for the names of the two books he found most interesting and pleasing in 1896: "I find it exceedingly difficult to answer your question, as I have found much pleasure and happiness in various portions of the writings of Browning, Ruskin, and the completed Philosophy of Herbert Spencer. I have also been much interested in the very instructive Biography of the late Cardinal Manning; but, on the whole, the two works which have perhaps pleased and interested me most in 1896 are Dean Plumptre's Dante—my interest in Italy and Italian literature having been greatly quickened by a long visit to Italy two years ago; and, secondly, a small but extremely instructive and suggestive work recently published by Macmillan for the author of The Social Horizon, entitled Evil and Evolution. This book, like the Thoughts on Religion, by the late George Romanes, edited by Canon Gore, which I have also studied with much interest, is a striking illustration of the return to Scriptural orthodoxy on the part of those who are most saturated with the results of modern scientific learning."

AMERICA is becoming the golden land for the English magazine, as well as that of indigenous growth. The Strand circulates there to the extent of 60,000 to 70,000; the Pall Mall Magazine sells between 20,000 and 30,000; and the English Illustrated Magazine, called across the Atlantic the New Illustrated Magazine, is rapidly building up a reputation. Meanwhile, Pearson's Monthly, with a first-rate bait in the shape of Mr. Kipling's "Captains Courageous," is about to begin an American existence. The home magazines, however, completely distance any of ours in popularity.

"TWELFTH NIGHT" will be revived before the members of the Elizabethan Stage Society, in the Middle Temple Hall, on Friday evening, the 12th inst. The comedy will be acted at the day's end of the hall on a platform. Mr. Arnold Dolmetsch provides the music, and Capt. Hutton advises as to the sword-play. It is a few days more than 296 years ago since the play was recited in the same hall, then newly erected, before Queen Elizabeth and a distinguished company, the date of that representation being February 2, 1601. Mr. Inderwick, Q.C., in the introduction to his Calendar of the Inner Temple Records, says, in allusion to that event: "As it was the custom of the benchers of the two inns to be present at each other's performances, our benchers were probably present on this occasion. The account of this performance is gained from a MS. diary of John Manningham, a member of the Middle Temple, who was present at the representation. The passage describing the play is quoted in extenso by Halliwell, who gives it in facsimile."

A REPRINT of Mr. Meredith's Essay on Comedy will be published in volume form by Messrs. Constable.

THE volume of the same publishers' "Illustrated Standard Novels" for February is Thomas Love Peacock's Misfortunes of Elphin and Rhododaphne, with forty full-page illustrations by Mr. F. H. Townsend. This completes the works of Peacock.

MESSRS. A. CONSTABLE & Co. announce a book on the recent Jameson Raid, by Mr. F. E. Garrett, the editor of the Cape Times. In order that his story of the Jameson Raid and Johannesburg Revolt should be thoroughly accurate, Mr. Garrett has secured the co-operation of all the chief actors in the drama, and has thus produced a highly valuable and authentic history of the stirring episodes which took place in the Transvaal at the beginning of the year 1896; but what will be looked for with the keenest curiosity is a special chapter, for which Mr. Garrett has come to England to complete the materials, dealing with the points on which the world has been led to expect startling disclosures in the near future.

A NEW novel by Olive Schreiner may be expected before long.

DURING her stay in England, Miss Beatrice Harraden will see through the press her Californian story, Hilda Strafford, which ran through Blackwood's Magazine last year. The volume will be issued at the end of this month by Messrs. Blackwood.

THE following work is now in the press, and will be published by Mr. Quaritch: A Chinese Biographical Dictionary, by Herbert A. Giles, late H.M. Consul at Ningpo. It will contain about 2,500 lives of the most eminent Chinese statesmen, warriors, philosophers, poets, painters, travellers, priests, rebels, beauties, &c., &c., from the earliest ages down to the present day. Biographical notices of the Emperors will also be included.

THE first edition of Dr. Jokai's new work, The Green Book, was exhausted on publication. A second edition is in preparation and will be ready shortly.

MR. HILLIARD ATTERIDGE, who accompanied the recent expedition to Dongola as a special correspondent, has written an account of his experiences, which will be published next week by Messrs. Innes & Co. under the title of Towards Khartoum. The book will be copiously illustrated from photographs taken by the author, and will have numerous sketch maps.

THE BOOK MARKET.

BOOKSELLING NOTES.

MR. HENNIKER-HEATON is the publishers' as well as the people's advocate in post-office matters. This week he asked the Secretary to the Treasury whether it is fair that publishers should have to pay postage on books which they forward under legal compulsion to the British Museum. Mr. Henniker-Heaton backed his question by asserting that publishers resent this obligation, and that many of them refuse to stamp parcels.

IN reply, Mr. Hanbury professed he could see no reason for relieving publishers of this expense. He said that the British Museum readily recovers the deficient postage. This only proves that the grievance is big enough to gall the publisher, though not big enough to make him fight. He said that the amount of such postage is very small. This only shows that publishers have had to find cheaper ways of delivering their books. It may be that large publishers would never use the post. But the smaller publishers stand differently; and that there is a real grievance is indicated by the fact that the matter has been brought forward sufficiently often to be, as Mr. Hanbury himself said, "repeatedly considered by various Governments." Moreover, the expense, as stated above, must, in many cases, be multiplied by five. Not only the British Museum, but also the Bodleian, the Cambridge Public Library, the Library of the Faculty of Advocates at Edinburgh, and that of Trinity College, Dublin, are empowered to say to the publisher: "Send us such a book," and he sends it.

IT is announced that among the most interesting literary items to be sold by public auction during the coming season is the entire autograph MS. of Keats's Endymion. This MS., which will be put up by Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson & Hodge, comes direct from a descendant of the Mr. Taylor, of Taylor & Hessey, who first published Keats's little volume in the early part of the century, and it has never before appeared in the market. The MS., says the Times, comprises 181 leaves, and includes the four "Books" into which the poem was divided. The alterations in pencil and pen are exceedingly interesting, and, with the exception of one folio, the MS. is entirely in the beautifully clear and neat handwriting of the poet. In addition to Endymion, the same sale will include, also from the same source, the autograph MS. of Lamia, which covers twenty-six pages folio. Both MSS. bear the usual "instructions to the printer," and are consequently the actual "copy" from which the poems were set up in type.

OTHER autographs which are announced for early auction are some half-dozen letters of Burns. One is to his friend Ainslie, and another to "Clarinda." In the latter Burns writes, in that unhappy, stilted style into which he so often dropped in his letter-writing:

"MY DEAREST CLARINDA,—You are ever present with me, and these hours that draw by among the fools and rascals of this world are only supportable in the idea [that] they are the forerunners of that happy hour that ushers me to the mistress of my soul."

IN the same sale will be offered (by Messrs. Sotheby) a complete series of sixteen original etchings on India paper, by R. C. Lucas, illustrating Tam O' Shanter. These are dated 1841, and it is believed that not a dozen sets were put into circulation.

AMONG interesting printed books shortly to come into the sale room are two well worth mention: a copy of Childe Harold, from the library of Sir Henry Parkes, bearing on the fly-leaf the autograph of Lady Bacon, to whom Byron dedicated the poem—calling her "Lanthe"; and a first edition of Paradise Lost, inscribed by Milton himself, as a gift to "my loving friend, Mr. Francis Rea, bookbinder in Worcestershire."

THE prices obtained at the sale of book-plates which Messrs. Puttick & Simpson held a week ago (the first of its kind) quite dismayed some old collectors. One, writing to the Daily Chronicle, throws up his hands in despair, and says that if the hobby is to become, through the influence of dealers, "a rich man's expensive folly," he can no longer pursue it. But he should be more philosophical. Every fad has its stages, and the stage at which it attracts the wealthy ignoramus is not entirely without compensations to the indigent connoisseur. It engenders activity; activity engenders new facts and discoveries. The preservation of the objects of his love is at least ensured, and often he has but to play a waiting game to triumph.

CERTAINLY the prices given in the above sale must have disconcerted those who had been used to buy book-plates with their loose coppers. The 278 lots catalogued by Messrs. Puttick & Simpson produced about £300. Here are a few of the more interesting results: An armorial plate of Charles Lennox, Duke of Richmond, £1 4s.; a plate of the Honourable Mistris Primerose, a member of the Rosebery family, 15s.; a scarce example of Philip Sydney, Earl of Leicester, dated 1704, £1 3s.; a fine armorial plate of Thomas Penn, of Stoke Pogis, in the county of Bucks, son of the founder of Pennsylvania, £6; a pictorial plate of Andrew Lumisden, private secretary of the Stuart Princes, engraved and signed by Sir Richard Strange, the eminent picture collector and engraver, £1 10s.; the Chippendale plate of David Garrick, with bust of Shakespeare, £1 10s.; one of the earliest specimens of the style known as "book-pile" plates, Dr. A. Charlton, about 1699, £1 18s.; the portrait bookplate of Jacob Gibbs, the architect of the Church of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, dated 1736, £1; the emblematic plate with arms of Sir F. Cunliffe, engraved by Bartolozzi, £1 6s.; a set of seven plates of the Walpole family, £3 12s.; and Hogarth's finely engraved plate, £1 10s.

MR. KARSLAKE's window exhibitions in the Charing Cross-road are attracting the attention they deserve. This week the display consists of a collection of rare and early portraits of the Royal Family. One of the nine items offered by Mr. Karslake is a framed proof impression of the engraving by Samuel Cousins of Winterhalter's portrait group of Queen Victoria, Prince Albert, the Princess Royal, Prince of Wales, Prince Alfred, Princess Alice, and others. The other items are royal portraits and groups and a framed autograph of Her Majesty the Queen.

MR. CEDRIC CHIVERS, of Bloomsbury, whose monthly lists of newly published books are known to most booksellers, has issued his twelve lists for 1896 as a new yearly volume, forming a record of the publications of the year. The books are arranged in numerical sequence month by month under their authors' names. The full title, the price, and the publisher are given, and many of the books have been annotated in a practical way. An index of subjects and titles, and another of authors, complete a very useful, as it is certainly a well printed, publication. We shall consult it frequently.

As showing the continued popularity of C. H. Spurgeon's sermons, it is stated that Messrs. Passmore received the other day a single order for a million sermons by the late pastor of the Metropolitan Tabernacle.

SOME BOOKSELLERS' CATALOGUES.

WE continue, below, our brief comments on catalogues of books which have reached us from second-hand booksellers in various parts of the country:

MR. THOMAS SIMMONS (Charing Cross-road, W.C.):

MR. SIMMONS's list opens with an item of considerable interest to readers of antiquarian tastes. This is a complete set of the Archæologia of the Society of Antiquaries of London, from the beginning in 1770 down to 1895 inclusive; also the Royal Charter, statutes, and orders and regulations of the Society; in all, seventy-eight volumes. The illustrations in these are very numerous, many being in colour, and the contributors include such antiquarians as Dr. Stukeley, Sir W. Hamilton, Captain Grose, Samuel Lysons, Sir John Lubbock, and Dean Stanley. Mr. Simmons's price is thirty guineas. On another page we note a copy of vol. ii. of Ben Jonson, belonging to the edition of 1640, concerning which Mr. Simmons states: "It is Charles II.'s copy when Prince of Wales, having the 'C.P.' with the 'Feathers' and motto 'Ich Dien' stamped in gold on the sides. Books from the library of the Merry Monarch are of extreme rarity. The above is a particularly interesting example; the father and mother of Charles appearing in the 'Names of the Masquers.'" This volume is priced at five guineas. Among less expensive volumes catalogued by Mr. Simmons is Mr. Robert Buchanan's essay on The Fleshly School of Poetry and other Phenomena of the Day. The withdrawal of this book early in its career has made it rare, and for this copy, which is bound by Rivière in crushed levant, the price is £1.

HENRY YOUNG & SONS (Liverpool):

The list just issued by this firm is a very good specimen of what a second-hand bookseller's list should be. It is full and various and well classified. A copy of the first edition of Sir John Denham's Poems and Translations, with The Sophy in its original calf binding, is listed at £1 10s. It contains the separate title-page to The Sophy, which is so often missing. A large-paper copy of Captain Gronow's Reminiscences and Recollections, that storehouse of anecdotes of camps, courts, and clubs, is offered here for £3 3s. It should be added that the two volumes contain a double set of plates, one set being proofs before letters, and the other proofs coloured by hand. This copy is one of a small edition issued in this manner to subscribers. A number of the finest productions of the Kelmscott Press are catalogued by Messrs. Young & Sons, including The Golden Legend, The Life and Death of Jason, Chaucer's The Flower and the Leaf, &c., at moderate prices. A scarce item in this catalogue is a facsimile of the Map of the World which Richard de Bello made in the year 1800. The original is now at Hereford, and concerning it there is this interesting note. "It is," next to Ptolemy's, "the oldest map of the world extant, and a very interesting account of it will be found in the Gentleman's Magazine for 1813. The world is represented as a sphere surrounded by the ocean; Jerusalem is in the centre, the south is at the top, and the north at the bottom; and illustrations of mythical men, animals, fishes, &c., thought to be indigenous to the various foreign countries abound. At the bottom right-hand corner of the map is a drawing of the author, Richard de Bello, on horseback, accompanied by his page and hound; and in the left-hand corner the Pope of that day is represented holding a document, on which is the seal of Cæsar Augustus, intimating that the whole world is to be taxed. At the top is represented Christ and the angels admitting some spirits into heaven and condemning others to hell. The map measures 71 by 61 inches when open, but when closed only 16 by 12½ inches." Messrs. Young's price for the facsimile is £1 5s.

Messrs. DOUGLAS & FOULIS (Edinburgh):

This Edinburgh firm's catalogues are usually rich in learned and antiquarian works. In a list filling forty-two double-column pages, we note the following entries: The Boks of Saint Albans, reproduced in facsimile from the edition of 1486, with an introduction by William Blades; quarto, £1 1s. National MSS. of Scotland, being facsimiles photo-zincographed by Colonel Sir H. James, in 8 vols., atlas folio, $8 10s. M.S. Collections for the Poetical Works of Sir David Lyndsay of the Mount, by George Chalmers, with glossary and a letter in the handwriting of Archibald Constable, respecting the publication, quarto, half-calf, £3. The list includes family histories of Dundas of Fingask, the Gordons, the Mackenzies, the Macdonalds of Clauranald, and others. We espay also Leigh Hunt's A Jar of Honey from Mount Hybla, with twenty-five illustrations by Richard Doyle, the first edition, £1 12s.

Messrs. DEIGHTON & BELL (Cambridge):

A Cambridge bookseller's list is sure to express Cambridge, and this is the case with the list before us. The youth and vigour of the University are reflected in this catalogue of standard works mainly in modern, well-edited editions. A complete set of Mr. A. H. Bullen's editions of Elizabethan Poetry and Drama in nine volumes, of which some have become very scarce, is offered at £12. The British Essayists, as collected by Chalmers in thirty-eight duodecimo volumes, with portraits, and including the Tatler, Spectator, Guardian, Rambler, Idler, &c., cannot be dear at £2 15s. From these it is a sharp transition to a set of the works of that delightful literary flaneur, Octave Uzanne, whose exquisite The Fan and The Sunshade, the Glove, and the Muff are priced at £1 7s. 6d. each. Messrs. Deighton & Bell have numerous entries under Shakespeare, Tennyson, R. L. Stevenson, Swinburne, the Shelley Society, Ruskin, and the Kelmscott Press. The late Mr. John Addington Symonds's Life of Michelangelo Buonarroti, the first edition, with fifty reproductions, is priced £3 8s., and the late Mr. P. G. Hamerton's Graphic Arts, in Roxburghe binding, £5 5s.

NEW BOOKS RECEIVED.

OUR list of new books to hand is this week fairly long and various. Under Theology we have Dr. George S. Keith's new work, A Plea for a Simpler Faith (Kegan Paul). It will doubtless attract many of the readers who have lately called for six editions of his similarly entitled work, A Plea for a Simpler Life. The issue of The Modern Reader's Bible (Macmillans) has reached The Chronicles in the chronological order of books adopted by the editor. As in the other volumes, the Revised Version is used. Under Philosophy the translation of Zeller's works on Aristotle and the Earlier Peripatetics, issued by Messrs. Longmans, should be noted.

History is represented by four books, of which two are histories of Canada and France. The "Famous Scots" Series (Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier) is continued in Mr. W. Keith Leask's James Boswell. A military biography of considerable interest is a Life of "Redan Windham," being the Crimean Diary and Letters of Lieut.-General Sir Charles Ash Windham. The book is written by Captain Charles Windham, son of General Windham, and has an introduction by Sir William Howard Russell.

Politics in 1896, a new year-book, issued by Mr. Grant Richards, and edited by Mr. Frederick Whelen, has been very fully announced, and now arrives as a well-printed and handy volume in red cloth. A diary and an index are appended to the five articles of which the book is composed, treating of Home and Foreign Affairs, the Services, the United States, and London.

A new and important work on the British Navy, published by Mr. Murray, is The Navy and the Nation; or, Naval Warfare and Imperial Defence, by Lieut.-Col. Sir George S. Clarke and James R. Thursfield.

EDUCATIONAL NOTES.

THE Council of King's College are to be congratulated on having successfully arranged to remove the school to a site where it will be possible for it to obtain elbow-room, and to a neighbourhood in other respects better suited to scholastic purposes than the vicinity of the Strand. Owing chiefly to the unsatisfactory nature of its accommodation and its environment, King's College School has been languishing of late years, and had it possessed the necessary means, doubtless the above step would have been taken before. Funds have, however, now been raised by debentures which have been taken up by friends of the school, and the South Hayes estate at Wimbledon has been bought. The property includes buildings which are said to be capable of adaptation to school purposes and to lend themselves readily to future enlargement; while, as there are six acres of land, King's College School will at last possess a playground. The removal will take place at Easter.

THE ratepayers of Islington, voting under the Free Library Act, have by a majority of 3,075 rejected Mr. Passmore Edwards's offer of £10,000 towards the cost of erecting three public libraries in the parish. The refusal of this generous proposal throws a lurid light on the strange changes that take place in the class and the character of the populations of the suburbs, or rather what once were the suburbs, of our ever absorbent capital. The time was when Islington might have been termed a literary, almost a learned, settlement, and could boast a fairly long roll of celebrities in the world of letters. Some fifty or sixty years ago, too, with a population of about 40,000, it founded and supported its own public school, which for many years was a flourishing and highly respectable establishment; reckoning among its head masters the late Dr. Jackson, Bishop of London, turning out among its alumni (to name specimens) such men as Mr. Justice Pearson, Mr. Grignon (fifth classic in 1846), and the evilly-rewarded maker of Felsted School, Dr. Ballard, F.R.S., whose death was recorded last week; and amassing a very honourable collection of fellowships, scholarships, and other distinctions at the universities. Islington had also its own literary and scientific institution, where some of the most eminent scientists and littérateurs of the day would lecture, which contained an excellent library. All this continued till well within the memory of many that yet live. Meanwhile, the 40,000 inhabitants swelled to upwards of 300,000, and before the advance of the builder the better stamp of families steadily retired. Not only the personnel, but the whole breed and type of the population has altered—quality has given place to quantity. The local public school has disappeared, the Literary and Scientific Institution has been converted into quarters for the Salvation Army, and repeated attempts to establish a Public Library in this vast parish have met with repeated failure.

THE remarks of the Duke of Devonshire in connexion with the proceedings of the Head Masters' Association were, on the whole, encouraging. He "trusts that at no distant date" the matter of Secondary Education will be taken in hand by the Government.

One somewhat dangerous phrase was quoted by his Grace with approval: he alluded to the necessity of preserving the "rich variety" of our educational life. This is a quality which calls for careful watching. A "rich variety" which was permitted to be too rich in its variety might come perilously near to a perpetuation of the present chaos. There is one point, and a point of extreme importance, which was not made clear in this speech—that is, whether the proposed Central Authority is to possess powers of prohibition. Apparently it is to be granted powers of persuasion: we trust that this is euphemistic for something considerably more potent. Rein and curb, rather than whip and spur, will be required to keep the team of Local Boards from indulging too freely in a "rich variety" of curvet and caracole. His Grace admitted that "up to the present time he did not think that the question of secondary education had received at the hands either of politicians or of the public all the attention it deserved; . . . that up to now it had received but a fitful, and sometimes almost merely a local amount of attention";

and he paid a just tribute to the scholastic profession in publicly recognising the fact that the demand for the organisation of secondary education has come from the schoolmaster himself, not from the country at large, which is still to a pitiable extent partly ignorant and partly inert about the matter. As it is by no means certain that any material advantage is likely to accrue to the teacher in consequence of this movement, the impulse is the more creditable. And it need hardly be said that the inspiration has come from the masters of schools which are upon a public footing: the private venturer, whose steady retirement from the field in the face of worthier forces has been going on for some time, and whose final disappearance will happily be accelerated by the measures in prospect, naturally wants no inconvenient investigation or interference. His wants, however, have no claim to be considered. He is a survival of the dark ages of English education; a survival that is not interesting, only mischievous. In conclusion, we are glad to note the numerical progress of a body that has done so much valuable practical work during the half-dozen years of its existence as has the Head Masters' Association: the 109 members of 1890 have swelled into 362 in 1896.

It seems strange that the meeting of the Teachers' Guild should have clashed in respect of date with that of the Head Masters' Association. At the afternoon sitting the Secondary Education Bill was discussed here also, and here also the need for a Central Authority was insisted upon by speaker after speaker. The corollary to this, the absorption by it of the functions of the Charity Commission, was strongly urged by Prof. Jebb.

So, too, in the resolutions submitted to the Lord-President of the Council by the Joint Committee for Promoting Legislation on Secondary Education, the establishment of a Central Authority, and the merging in it of the educational functions of the Charity Commission form the most prominent features; while the "inclusion in local authorities of an adequate proportion of persons possessing educational experience," which appears in one clause, will be a sufficient safeguard if "an adequate proportion" is to be read as equivalent to "a majority." The strong and general feeling that the Charity Commission has been suffered to play its fantastic tricks far too long has not expressed itself a day too soon. The extinction of its educational functions would be hailed with universal delight. The Endowed Schools Commissions would go down to their scholastic grave "unwept, unhonoured, and unsung": or if any tears fell at their demise they would be tears of joy; if any song were raised, it would be a jubilate or a pæan.

RATIONAL EDUCATION.

The New School, Abbotsholme,
Derbyshire (near Rocester),
February, 1, 1897.

To the Editor of the ACADEMY.

In your issue of January 23, under this heading, appears a review of Mr. De Brath's book, The Foundations of Success. Prof. Ramsay expresses the hope "that its teaching may be ere long translated into action." Will you allow us to point out that, at the "New School, Abbotsholme," founded in 1889 by Dr. Cecil Reddie, its present headmaster, theory had been translated into fact long before Mr. De Brath gave his book to the world?

We all knew this school at least a year before the appearance of the book, three of us before Mr. De Brath became an assistant-master here in 1894; and on reading the book we could not fail to see the curious resemblance which its educational views and methods bear to our work here.

The author, while acknowledging his obligations to various writers for many of his theories, omits to mention that he had practical experience here of what is essentially the system he advocates. He leaves the public to understand that the system has yet to be tried in England. That this is the inference of the public is shown by the reviews in the ACADEMY and the Times.

We are glad to see the principles in which we believe, even many of the details of our work, set forth in this book in so luminous and portable a form, but we cannot help thinking that the author would have made a stronger case for his opinions had he mentioned a school where most of his theories have been put into practice, we venture to hope with some measure of success.

ART.

FORD MADOX BROWN.

AT the back of the catalogue of this exhibition there is a sonnet to accompany the picture which is the centre of the collection—"Work." We are to suppose that the sonnet is by the painter; but, whoever the author, it ought not to have been printed. There could hardly be a worse sonnet, more encumbered in rhythm or silly in rhyme; it leads off with a trochaic line, and has "its" printed "it's." Nor does the picture read more felicitously. It is to be read, according to the intentions of Ford Madox Brown, and is only by a violence of terms to be called a picture. It is even less a picture, perhaps, than "The Drinking Customs," by Cruikshank, though it has, needless to say, immeasurably better parts of pictures than that frankly disconnected work. The comparison is a cruel one, for Ford Madox Brown not only was a draughtsman of ability, but had a rather distinguished sense of composition. "Work," again, is not, for all its arbitrary thronging, like one or two recent groups of Mr. Alma Tadema's. In these latter there is a veritable disintegrating energy, an effect of explosiveness, as though the parts were on the point to fly asunder. Ford Madox Brown holds his picture in a mechanical union of almost grotesque ingenuity, and even the sobriety of its colour may serve to quiet and contain the overcharged fragments within a kind of order.

THE importance attached to "Work" by those who are answerable for the arrangement of the pictures and for the instructions of the catalogue is, of course, significant of its place in the minds of all who look at a picture as something other than a local and centred vision. These would have a picture loaded with little essays; and the essays are bound to be platitudes. That which Madox Brown had to say was not worth printing, and he painted it. Ce qui ne vaut pas la peine d'être dit, on le chante. Prose is purged of trivialities by the "Sister Arts," which so make haste to absorb them. What, in fact, has the painter to tell us? That navvies at work on the wayside have a vocation unlike that of Carlyle or Kingsley; that of both these kinds of workers idle women are the opposite; that such women would do better as guardians of poor children than of little dogs. This is the principal; there are other incidents in the background (if the mosaic of such a picture can be said to have a background) such as the roughness of the police to an orange girl, and the leisure of a youngish colonel riding with his daughter. But the chief things painted are those just mentioned. There is no ingenuity in saying them; in painting them there is ingenuity, but not imagination.

INGENUITY—invention—without imagination is apparently the note of Ford Madox Brown's mind. It is proved by a hundred devices. He loves to account for things.

In "The Expulsion of the Danes from Manchester" not a stone strikes a man down but you are forced to find the hand that sent it out of a window. You may have to look under this figure's elbow, and over that one's head, but if you look with sufficient agility you will be sure to find what the painter has ready for you. One of the ladies in "Work" is tossing a tract to a working man. And there, in mid-air, flying, is the tract. The confusion—for this much "thought-out" picture is a confusion to the eye—is worse for the glass that covers it, so that you are not sure whether the tract does not show its title in print; at any rate, the painter gives it in his long pages of explanation; and the incident of the title is a most unpictorial one either way.

FORD MADOX BROWN was a draughtsman of action. He did not grasp action in the strongest manner, but he took hold; and this rare quality—rare even in the minor form—shall not pass without praise. The Danes flying through the little Manchester street are in motion. In several other places is proved this power of the hand, which none of the other qualities necessarily bring with them, and which is not to be learnt. It fails, at times, even him who has it, as in the figure of Jacob in "Jacob and Joseph's Coat." The patriarch is intended to be weakened by sudden grief, but the weakness is weakly expressed. There is something of initial feebleness also in the several "Lear" pictures. One of these was painted after the illustration in the Germ: a very hideous illustration, not to mince words, in which the artist seemed wilfully to forego and deny the knowledge he had of the human figure for the sake of some search for a strangeness dear to young men in 1850, as it has been again last year under sillier shapes. That research is always a confession of poverty, and the half-century-old confession is rather a sorry story.

IF, however, Ford Madox Browne's action and movement are signs of a not common natural capacity, in expression he fails. Expression in the face of man is one of the most purely and lawfully pictorial things with which a painter has to deal. It appeals to the eye, it is the drama of life. It is the way of communication proper to painting among all arts; and assuredly those who confuse dramatic and pictorial expression with the "literary interest," and reject the two things without discrimination, should be held guilty of that same untechnical, untaught, and slovenly mingling and mistaking of one art with another, against which they profess to give the world an elementary lesson. Ford Madox Brown is as weak in expression as any painter of his time, and this is to say much. As though to offer amends, he makes much of the white of the eye—a once common device; but no amount of white can give an instant of forthright expression. There is generally a peculiar nullity in his faces, and in the women's faces this adds to the coarseness of his types. He chose his models of middle-aged proportions and with stolid faces. His Juliet is gross, so is his Mary Chaworth.

ACTION is true, direct, strong, and intent in that beautiful picture, "Jesus Washing Peter's Feet," a replica of the one in the National Gallery; and here, too, is a better attempt at beauty of colour than is usual with this painter. Few ingenuities importune us here, and the dramatic character is much the better for it.

As for painting, there is one specimen of exceedingly beautiful work—work of a minor beauty, but exquisite in its kind—called "Waiting." It is a little pearl of fineness and sweetness, and the execution is altogether educated and worthy. Compared with it, the ugly workmanship of the greater quantity of this great aggregate of canvas looks the more wanton. "If a musician," said a painter, "knew as little of his business as Ford Madox Brown knew of his own, would he be allowed to perform at St. James's Hall?" Evidently not, and the difference in public exaction is inexplicable. On the other hand, a writer who knew as little of his business would pass easily enough. Musical performance has led the way into another world of criticism, doubtless for the reason that it is nothing but performance. Indeed, the painter who asked this question was entering upon the useless perils of comparisons; the Arts cannot be made to judge each other, even by way of illustration.

"OUR Ladye of Good Children" has a touch of the higher fancy—almost imagination—not usual in Ford Madox Brown's work. It is in this respect a kind of precursor of Von Uhde—a very insignificant little herald of an important work. The picture pleases. The Madonna, with the help of one or two ministering angels, is helping good English children to bed. The group has arrangement, decorum, and repose, an agreeable light, and tender feeling. The Madonna is, nevertheless, as coarse as any Italian Madonna after Raphael. And the name suggests the question as to what was Ford Madox Brown's position among the English Pre-Raphaelites of the middle century. He was one of them in treating distant things as small in size, but not otherwise affected by remoteness. In his most ingenious popular picture, "The Last of England," the black in the nails of quite a little man, seen through some chinks in the composition of the foreground group, has been thoughtfully painted. Through other chinks you may study the markings of little cabbages, and ascertain the station in life of half an emigrant's head, and the probable character of a small piece of another emigrant's mother. Are we not a sporting nation? There is something of the hunting-field in our cavalry charges; something of the covert in our little wars; in our most English pictures a suggestion of the game.

IN default of certain knowledge that it is a statutable offence, I risk the confession that last Saturday night, at the Lyceum Theatre, I was bored by "Olivia." I do not remember in what year it was I first saw it, but it was at a time when I was less critical or less "cynical," or in some generally happier condition than I am now; for my recollection was of a pleasantly pathetic play, of a dear old vicar, of a beautifully erring daughter, and of an ending which brought tears to one's eyes. Nothing of this remained on Saturday night save the beautifully erring daughter. She was there, but the vicar was become an exasperating imbecile, and the ending was either brutal "social satire"—in which case it was out of tone with the rest of the play—or sheer inanity; and I imagine I owed the beautifully erring daughter to Miss Ellen Terry, and not to the late Mr. W. G. Wills. The fact I take to be that Mr. Wills, who was not without poetic imagination—for with all its faults I claim this of "Melchior"—had an idea of stage effect which was lifeless and wooden, and which cannot possibly endure. His "Faust" is foolish pantomime, his "Olivia" is sentimental folly. Goldsmith's Vicar of Wakefield is a novel in which atmosphere is everything, and the conventional, careless plot nothing at all. Mr. Wills came upon it and took the careless plot—its convention was practically dead, even in Mr. Wills's day—and left the irresistible atmosphere behind him. He added his own faults of the theatre, a slap-dash and unconvincing construction and a thin and vulgar dialogue.

THE result is a play where Goldsmith's carelessness becomes childishness, and Goldsmith's simplicity—I must say it—stupidity. You—if you are I—no longer love the vicar: you are enraged with his blindness. You no longer smile at the vicar's wife, or do so by reason of the acting only: you want her narrowness well rubbed into her. You hardly weep any more over Olivia. And as for Burchell—Burchell, nearly intolerable in the book, is an insult and an outrage in the play. I can think of one way only in which to make him conceivable, and that is to regard him as the villain of the piece. This man, whom Goldsmith and Mr. Wills hold up to your sympathies, deserves your direct execration. To gratify his decadent passion for contemplating others' folly he, being Sir William Thornhill, disguised himself as Burchell; he saw the insidious advances of his wicked nephew into Olivia's favour; he witnessed the seduction without turning a hair; he withheld the knowledge that the marriage was real to the end that he might gratify his morbid craving for sensation—an abominable man, this virtuous Mr. Burchell.

As for the happy ending, how utterly immoral it is! Olivia having thought she was married to Squire Thornhill, is told it was a mock marriage, and returns home to be spurned by her mother. Enter Burchell, who explains that the marriage was legal after all: Olivia at once sainted and caressed. The "social satire" is obvious, but I decline to believe that Mr. Wills intended an average theatrical audience to recognise the satire. No, he meant it for a sentimental effect, and as a sentimental effect it is exceedingly silly. So much for the play.

I WISH I could praise the playing to the extent of my lungs, but I find that impossible. Miss Terry was delightful, altered hardly a hair's breadth in her effects from what I remember years ago. When she entered first, laughing on her father's shoulder; when she caressed her little brothers; when she made love with her lover—"Am I? So are you!"—she was a natural girl. I did not think her intensity and pathos very strong; but then strength in those places would have knocked the play to pieces—therefore I admire her reticence. If you have any knowledge of the art of acting, Miss Terry's Olivia is a thing to see. But I pity her for the poverty of her dialogue.

MR. HERMANN VEZIN'S Dr. Primrose was new to me. I confess my recollection is that Sir Henry Irving's was better—fuller-bodied, more fruitful to the understanding. Mr. Vezin expresses a man of thin blood, who saw life as a misty picture, and even when awakened to its realities longed chiefly to dream again. That is not Goldsmith's Vicar, if it was Mr. Wills's. He rose to the occasion once or twice, but once or twice only. I liked Mr. Frank Cooper's Squire Thornhill. He was inclined to over act, and was deficient even in the assumed geniality of the deliberate profligate. But his manner when he undecieved Olivia—a manner compact of brutality, of half-pity, and of dislike of a scene—won me. I thought it almost absolutely right. Nobody can make Mr. Burchell a sympathetic character. Mr. Macklin, by a certain manliness of tone, which the wretch must surely have lacked, makes him less repulsive than he might have been. Miss Maud Milton was a querulous old woman—as Mrs. Primrose—whom one knows on the stage: she was amusing. Miss Julia Arthur was far better in the small part of Sophia than she was in her large part in "Richard III." Mr. Johnson was a credible Farmer Flamborough. Master Stewart Dawson and Miss Valli Valli had no such chance, of course, as they had in "The Holly Tree Inn," but they sustained their incipient reputation. The play was prettily staged in the Lyceum manner.

THE authors of "The Free Pardon"—they were Mr. F. C. Philips and Mr. Leonard Merrick—produced on the 28th of last month at the Olympic, seem, more or less, to have attempted an impossible achievement. They have tried to wed dialogue not melodramatic to a plot of the most melodramatic order imaginable. They have not so tried invariably; the facile charms of blank-verse cadence have tempted them to their fall now and again. If they had been consistent, the result would not have been commendable: the touch of reality in sincere dialogue would have exposed the unreality of their plot. As it is, their occasionally and more or less natural dialogue is an element of weakness, not of strength. For their plot is of the stage, stagey. It assumes that an affectionate father will believe his son to be a forger on the word of the villain, and with no other evidence than a cheque which the villain denies he has signed. It assumes that a woman will tell all sorts of abominable lies on the off chance of the villain marrying her. It assumes other such things, and to come to points of detail, it assumes that convicts wear their hair as before, and having escaped from prison in convict garb can get themselves into their dress of Act I., including nice fashionable collars, in the course of a day or so. Even our old friends, the Adelphi guests, whose decease we have all lamented, reappear in it and say: "Ladies and gentlemen, let us go into supper"; and when the villain's cousin arrives in his country house, where she had lived all her life, these—presumably his neighbours—nudge and wink at one another. I like old-fashioned melodrama, but I like it neat, without an attempt at superior and plausible dialogue.

THERE were one or two dramatic scenes in the play. One, where the hero was locked in a side-room while the villain murdered his father, was nearly spoiled on the first night by the villain's incapacity to open the door, which, if not overcome, would have put a strain on the inventiveness of the actors. I watched anxiously—but alas! the door was opened. Another was where the benevolent wife of the warder concealed the escaped convict (the hero, of course), and the warder thought he was her lover, and the hero gave himself away.

THE surprise of the acting was that Mr. Abingdon was not the villain, but the comic man of the piece. He played an American interviewer with liveliness, but with an impossible American accent. I have heard several impossible American accents on the stage, and have always wondered at them. My own list of acquaintances is not abnormally large, but it includes several people with an authentic American accent, and I should have thought actors had opportunities for studying it. I like Mr. Abingdon better as a villain. The villain in this piece, Mr. O'Neill, was the subordinate fiend in "The Sorrows of Satan"; he was not very good. Nor was the hero, Mr. Hunter, who was too flabbily sentimental. Miss Esmé Beringer was the heroine. She played with effect, but I hope she will not play too often in melodrama, because the encouragement to over-acting, which is her vice, may spoil what is certainly a promise of artistic playing. Miss Vane's repentant villainess was properly lugubrious, but not effective. Miss Cicely Richards was clever and amusing as the warder's wife; Mr. Courtenay Thorpe was earnest, but not particularly credible, as the imbecile and deceived father; Mr. Cockburn was a hearty and manly warder. And I am an indulgent critic.

SCIENCE.

IN the Fortnightly for this month Mr. Grant Allen performs what may fairly be called a public service. He has set the world right on the subject of Spencer and Darwin. By the world I mean what Mr. Grant Allen calls "the averagely well-read man," not the biologist, who is as a rule self-opinionated. The misconception which has grown up round the name of Darwin is curious, and points to two elemental facts—first, that one is apt to lose sight of the historical sequences of one's age (pace Dr. Merz, who in his admirable History of Modern Thought regards each age as its own best chronicler), and secondly, that it is a human habit "to find an ostensible figure-head for every movement, and then to attach everything in the movement to that figure-head alone."

In this particular matter it is, as Mr. Grant Allen says, a common error even among well-educated people to credit Darwin with having invented "the Theory of Evolution." A greater error could not well be. If any modern thinker invented the theory of evolution it was Mr. Herbert Spencer, who had elaborated its main outlines before Darwin ever put pen to paper, and who even on the subject of organic evolution, which was the field in which Darwin worked, had seven years before the appearance of the Origin of Species enunciated the following "Darwinian" doctrine:

"The supporters of the Development Hypothesis . . . can show that the process of modification has effected, and is effecting, great changes in all organisms, subject to modifying influences. . . . They can show that any existing species—animal or vegetable—when placed under conditions different from its previous ones, immediately begins to undergo changes of structure fitting it for the new conditions. They can show that in successive generations these changes continue, until ultimately the new conditions become the natural ones. . . . They can show, too, that the changes daily taking place in ourselves . . . the development of every faculty, bodily, moral, or intellectual, according to the use made of it, are all explicable on this same principle. And thus they can show that throughout all organic nature there is at work a modifying influence of the kind they assign as the cause of these specific differences, an influence which, though slow in its action, does in time, if the circumstances demand it, produce marked changes" (The Leader, March, 1852).

In this short abstract of a very remarkable passage we have clearly laid down the principles of "Descent with Modification," which is the doctrine commonly attributed to Darwin. What we have not got is the theory of "Natural Selection," or, as Spencer himself called it later, "Survival of the Fittest," which it was the crowning work of Darwin to have discovered and proved.

AND even here Mr. Spencer, in at least one published essay, came so near anticipating Darwin's great discovery that if he does not quite re-echo Huxley's "How stupid of us not to have thought of that!" he permits himself the mild observation that it "shows how near one may be to a great generalisation without seeing it." The passage is one on Population, in the Westminster Review for 1852; and incidentally it is interesting to notice that it was Malthus's essay on Population which first gave Darwin his idea of the principle operating throughout organic nature.

"All mankind subject themselves more or less to the discipline described. They either may or may not advance under it, but in the nature of things only those who do advance under it eventually survive. For necessarily families and races whom the increasing difficulty of obtaining a living . . . does not stimulate to improvement in production are on the high road to extinction, and must ultimately be supplanted by those whom the pressure does so stimulate."

The passage then goes on to show that premature death acts in the same direction by removing those less fitted, and leaving those best fitted to survive the conditions of life. The inference it fails to draw, but which Darwin drew, is that herein lies the great agency which determines (if it does not produce) different specific characters.

So much for one popular error, that which credits Darwin with the whole of the theory of Organic Evolution. Mr. Grant Allen next devotes some space to refuting a second, that which credits Darwin with Evolution in general, regarded as a cosmical process. I think he here underrates the intelligence of the "averagely well-read man." It is difficult to believe that that individual could be guilty of an absurdity which nullifies the one qualification he possesses, and by which he is known to us. However, accepting Mr. Grant Allen's assurance that there are people who regard Herbert Spencer as Darwin's disciple, let us glance at the more interesting question how far Spencer is indebted at all for the vast theory he has propounded. Mr. Clodd, in his lately published work, Pioneers of Evolution, traces the beginnings as far back as the Ionian philosophers, and pauses with quite a loving touch on Lucretius. Prof. Osborn, in his Greeks to Darwin, does much the same. This might be regarded as carrying the evolution of Evolution rather far. We trace cause and effect more clearly when we come down to Kant and Laplace, who laid the foundations for Spencer's theory as regards the celestial bodies; to Lyell and Murchison, who prepared the way in geology; to Buffon, Erasmus Darwin, and Lamarck, the pioneers of modern biology. The social field remained to be added, and this Mr. Spencer has chosen for his special province, working it up together with the other three sides already attacked into the great four-square theory which embraces the whole of nature.

FROM the point of view of this vast and far-reaching work, Charles Darwin's special contribution sinks into a minor place as but one agency exerted in one special field. Not that this is any depreciation of its importance. It is a wonderful work, wonderfully well executed; but it is not what it is commonly called, "Evolution." The subject is such an interesting one, and so vital if we are to understand the proper relationships of the foremost scientific movement of our own age, that I have gone into it rather at length, and have hardly space left to deal with the question, Why has all the praise been allotted to Darwin? Mr. Grant Allen gives what are probably the right reasons. First, as regards the biologists themselves, he supplied the missing clue (I dare not say link) which made Lamarck's doctrine tenable; and, secondly, as regards the public at large, he supplied an irresistible mass of well-marshalled facts in support of his proposition; and facts, as Mr. Grant Allen says—a handsome compliment from a Celt—are the only things which will convince an Englishman.

THE election of M. Gaston Paris, the philologist, to the presidency of the College of France is particularly interesting at the present time, when French science is divided into two sharply defined schools—representing on the one hand pure scientific research, and on the other a reactionary spirit of unwillingness to push inquiry too far. The spokesman of the latter party is M. Brunetiere, inventor of the famous, but foolish, phrase "la banqueroute de la science." M. Paris succeeds in his new office to M. Renan, and will carry on the same traditions as that most scientifically minded writer, if we may judge from the fragments of his inaugural address quoted in the press. Taking as his subject the life and work of Pasteur, whose remains have just been so magnificently entombed, M. Gaston Paris referred to science as "every day enhancing, enlarging, and rendering more precise our conception of the world; transforming the conditions of existence by submitting to definite laws the matter which oppressed us; and as inspiring in its votaries an almost religious enthusiasm."

AN attempt is being made by opponents of reform in the University of London to shelve the reconstitution Bill by the old device of proposing a new Charter, the draft of which is now being handed about. The competence of those responsible for the draft to gauge the situation may be estimated by the circumstance that they have entirely left out the Royal Colleges of Surgeons and Physicians from the bodies to be represented on the new senate. In view of the failure of previous attempts to reform the University by Charter, and of the inherent futility of any Charter to effect the most important of reforms, it is to be hoped that this attempt will not succeed. No new Charter granted to the present examining body, called the "University," can possibly give it the authority needed to co-ordinate the scattered teaching bodies in the metropolis. Nothing short of a Commission, armed by Parliament with executive authority, will succeed in this. It would be far better to leave the old University high and dry as a mere Imperial examining board, and start a new real University, than to patch up a new Charter. The dwindling number of candidates for degrees in arts, and the total failure of the law-faculty to keep in touch with the law-teaching in London, are signs of the times not to be ignored. It is much to be wished that the London University Bill might be re-introduced. H. C. M.

MUSIC.

MR. RICHARD GOMPERTZ performed, for the first time in England, Dvorák's Quartet in A flat (Op. 105) at his fourth concert at the small Queen's Hall last Wednesday week. The Czech composer has of late attracted much attention; the "Symphonic Poems" recently produced, seemed to show that his invention was failing, and that he was relying to some extent on what is termed a "poetic basis," one which, in the works in question, seemed of very doubtful quality. In the Quartet in A flat we have Dvorák at his strongest, but also at his weakest. The second movement has charm, character, and finish of form. The Lento, too, is attractive. The first movement, however, seems disjointed, while in the Finale the composer works on lines which recall the past rather than the present.

THE programme included Beethoven's great Quartet in A minor (Op. 132), and the four admirable Vocal Quartets of Brahms (Op. 92). The vocalists, Miss Hutchinson, Mme. Hope Glenn, and Messrs. Walter Ford and Herbert Thorndike evidently felt the true spirit of the music, yet their efforts were not all that could be desired.

LAST Friday week Miss Fanny Davies and Miss Louise Philipps gave an interesting Pianoforte and Vocal Recital at St. James's Hall. There was no novelty, but the programme—including songs by Schumann, Schubert, Brahms, also English composers, also pianoforte solos by Graun, Brahms, Mendelssohn, and Schubert—was highly attractive. Miss Philipps deserves praise for her artistic rendering of Schumann's cycle, "Frauenliebe und Leben," while Miss Davies played with her usual intelligence and earnestness.

SPECIAL Schubert concerts were given Saturday, Sunday, and Monday. At the Queen's Hall, on Saturday afternoon, only the first part of the programme of the first "Symphony Concert" was devoted to the master. I had hoped that Mr. Newman would at the last change his programme. The new Symphony by A. Glazounoff, or rather the Symphony new to a London audience, is certainly a clever and interesting work, yet there was no pressing necessity for its introduction on that particular day. And so, too, with the beautiful "Siegfried" Idyll of Wagner's. Of the instrumental music on the programme the "Unfinished" Symphony was the most important feature, and Mr. Henry J. Wood, the conductor, may be congratulated upon his reading of that work. He perhaps made his audience feel that he was anxious to render full justice to the noble music; his conducting was, in fact, a little too demonstrative. Such excess of zeal is, however, a small matter; for time and experience, of which he now has plenty, will tone that down. Mr. Wood, as I have already remarked, has natural gifts, and ought to become a really great conductor.

ALEXANDER GLAZOUNOFF, whose Symphony in B flat (No. 5, Op. 55) was performed for the first time in England, is spoken of as "one of the most prominent of living Russian composers." The work under notice testifies, indeed, to his ability; it is decidedly interesting, although, especially in the opening movement where the composer tries to win by help of the "sword" motive, the influence of Wagner is too strongly felt. The two middle movements, Scherzo and Andante, are, at any rate on first hearing, the most satisfactory. It is a curious, yet nevertheless, I believe, a true fact, that modern composers—with the exception of Brahms—do not succeed best in first movements in which depth of thought is the essential matter—the pearl of great price which many seek, but few find. To those who can read between the lines, clever writing and effective colouring only accentuate any weakness in the subject-matter. Glazounoff, however, must not be judged by one hearing, or by one work. We shall soon have an opportunity of renewing acquaintance with him, as he will conduct another Symphony of his own during the coming season of the Philharmonic Society.

THE concerted works of Schubert at the Monday Popular Concert were the Quartet in G (Op. 161), and the Quintet in C (Op. 163) written by the composer during the last year of his life. The Quartet shows many of Schubert's strong, and some of his weak, points. In the opening movement the thematic material is most engaging, while now and again those mysterious tremulous passages seem to betoken something tragic. Also in the mournful Andante there are signs of strange agitation. The Scherzo and Finale display lighter moods, and in the latter there are lengths not altogether heavenly. The Quintet in C with two violoncellos represents Schubert's highest achievement in chamber music. To anyone, however, imperfectly acquainted with his works in this department of musical art this would mean little. Schubert in this Quintet not only revealed the power of his genius, but, with the hour of dissolution nigh at hand, he seemed, as it were, to throw aside all his weaknesses. There is no padding, no digression, no anti-climax. The Adagio was his true swan's song; and never did tone-poet sing more plaintively, more tenderly, more solemnly. The movement was listened to with rapt silence; the applause at the close, though probably well meant—for the movement, and indeed the whole work, was magnificently interpreted by Lady Hallé, and Messrs. Ries, Gibson, Ludwig, and Piatti—broke the spell. There are moments when applause does not seem altogether inappropriate; but there are others in which it is positively revolting.

MISS FANNY DAVIES played, though scarcely in her best manner, the Impromptu in B flat (Op. 142). I cannot agree with Schumann, who spoke of both theme and variations as indifferent or insignificant, but I certainly think that, considering the rich store of music bequeathed to us by Schubert, a better solo might have been selected. And so, too, with the songs, sung with feeling and intelligence by Miss Bertha Salter. Though "Der Krähe," "Der Tod und das Mädchen," and "Der Wanderer" may be admirable specimens of the composer's lyric art, one might have expected, on this auspicious occasion, a selection of greater importance, and even one or more of the songs recently published for the first time.

THE anniversary was, in fact, celebrated in a half-hearted manner. One could see that from the programme-book, which did not even contain the date of Schubert's death; and the heading, "Schubert Centenary Concert, Monday evening, February 1, 1897," was somewhat misleading. Further on one read that "fifty years have passed since they [Beethoven and Schubert] both died," from which musicians not gifted with good memories might have inferred that Schubert and also Beethoven died in or about the year 1847. That sentence was evidently printed when the Quartet was first performed at the Popular Concerts in 1868. Thus Mr. Chappell's motto seems to be, *Ο γέγραφα, γέγραφα. Surely there ought to have been some special reference to the composer, some "appreciation" of his art-work. At any rate, the book might have been up to date. In the analytical remarks on the Quartet in G, it was stated that some of the works (i.e., Quartets) "are not in print." But the world moves on, and those words, true when first printed, are no longer so; all known Quartets of Schubert have been published by MM. Breitkopf and Härtel.

MR. HERMANN KLEIN gave a lecture last Thursday week at the "Society for the Encouragement of the Fine Arts." His subject was "Opera in England during the reign of H.M.G.M. Queen Victoria. Now not only has the reign of Her Majesty been an exceptionally long one, with a corresponding long record of noteworthy events in the history of opera, but the change in dramatic art, also in public taste, since 1837 has been one of striking import. It was therefore bold on the part of the lecturer to attempt to cover so much ground in so short a space of time; and he could give little more than an outline. Wagner now rules, and by dramatic right, the stage, but it is well that musicians, especially those of the rising generation, should be reminded of days when Rossini and Meyerbeer were the shining lights in the operatic firmament. Hence the lecture, well delivered, was instructive. Meyerbeer had his faults, which some modern writers have strongly emphasised; Mr. Klein, and wisely too, pointed out how the Jewish composer really prepared the way for Wagner. Vocal illustrations were given by various ladies, pupils of Mr. Klein, and it was curious to note that in the programme an Italian name, Rossini, formed the Alpha, and also an Italian name, Mascagni, the Omega. There is, however, this difference: Rossini shone by his own light, Mascagni fell under the influence of one mightier than himself.

CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. RUSSELL BARKER AND THE "DICTIONARY OF NATIONAL BIOGRAPHY."

Lincoln's Inn: Feb. 1.

I am sorry to trouble you on a purely personal matter, but the writer of the paragraphs in your issue of January 30 has misapprehended the dates and facts of the case while commenting on the correspondence between the editor and publisher of the Dictionary of National Biography and myself.

Instead of writing to the Times to explain that the blunder was the editor's and not mine, I went to the office of the Dictionary. I found that the editor was away for his holiday. Ultimately, however, I saw Mr. Seccombe, who, I believe, is the sub-editor. I requested him to ask the editor to write to the Times to explain the matter, and at the same time told him that I should be very glad to come round to see the editor and talk it over when he came to town. When the editor returned to London he wrote me a long letter, in which he endeavoured, unsuccessfully, to show that I ought to share the responsibility, of the mistake with him. He took no notice of my request that he should write to the Times, nor of my offer to come round and talk the matter over. As the editor offered me no redress, I then wrote to the publisher. Wishing to treat Mr. Lee with perfect fairness, I enclosed in my reply to his letter a copy of the letter which I had written to the publisher. Had I not sent Mr. Lee this copy, he never would have known that I had communicated with Mr. Smith. Having so far related the actual facts of the case, I have no wish to go any farther into the personal side of the question. The only public interest which arises out of the correspondence is the question whether an editor has any right to alter a signed article behind the contributor's back.

G. F. RUSSELL BARKER.

LEIGH HUNT.

Dealing with Leigh Hunt as a poet, as has already been pointed out in the ACADEMY, the only instance of his having really risen to greatness in his work is when, in competition with Shelley and Keats, he produced the well-known sonnet on the Nile. Everything else that he did justifies your description, "superficial"; nor does Mr. Walter Lewin adduce anything, in my opinion, to alter this view: certainly to cite "Abou Ben Adhem" does not help Mr. Lewin's case, as both for thought and expression might it not very well have been written by some amiable Unitarian minister?

With respect to the "cruel slander which links Hunt with Harold Skimpole," of which Mr. Lewin complains, I should like to call attention to the following significant reference to the subject which appears in Lord Macaulay's journal under date December 23, 1859:

"An odd declaration by Dickens that he did not mean Leigh Hunt by Harold Skimpole. Yet he owns that he took the light externals of the character from Leigh Hunt, and surely it is by those light externals that the bulk of mankind will always recognise character. Besides, it is to be observed that the vices of Harold Skimpole are vices to which Leigh Hunt had, to say the least, some little leaning, and which the world generally imputed to him most unsparingly. That he had loose notions of meum and tuum, that he had no high feeling of independence, that he had no sense of obligation, that he took money wherever he could get it, that he felt no gratitude for it, that he was just as ready to defame a person who had relieved his distress as a person who had refused him relief, these were things which, as Dickens must have known, were said, truly or falsely, about Leigh Hunt, and had made a deep impression on the public mind. Indeed, Leigh Hunt had said himself: 'I have some peculiar notions about money. They will be found to involve considerable difference of opinion with the community, particularly in a commercial country. I have not that horror of being under obligation which is thought an essential refinement in money matters.' This is Harold Skimpole all over. How, then, could D. doubt that H. S. would be supposed to be a portrait of L. H.?"

ARTHUR STONE.

BOOK REVIEWS REVIEWED.

Mr. Andrew Lang's "Pickle the Spy." (Longmans.)

TAKEN collectively Mr. Lang's fifteen proofs of the identity of the infamous spy who for eight years dogged the steps of Prince Charles Edward with his trusted follower Alexander Macdonell of Glengarry, appear to the Athenæum "damning, irresistible." Mr. Lang "has unmasked a dead traitor who has lain unsuspected . . . close upon seven score years . . . And he has done it well. . . . The interest of the work . . . centres . . . in Pickle, but it contains much else that is both new and curious." The Speaker takes occasion to point out that "the romantic interpretation of the '45 is largely a creation of the Saxon"; for Scott had not a drop of Celtic blood in him. "Here we have the reality, and a more squalid reality than this it would be hard to find." "The book shows Mr. Lang's fine sense for romance. . . . It is not quite as accurate as Mr. Lang's work ought to be, and it is more iterative and expansive than is seemly in what claims to be literature, yet its interest will not be denied." "It is," writes the Standard, "a curious psychological study which these pages reveal; and even if, as their author modestly suggests, the history contained in them is of little political account, it throws a startling light on men and manners during a fascinating epoch." The Chronicle regrets that it cannot devote more than two columns to Mr. Lang's "most interesting book, which is, on the whole, a very careful, ingenious, and valuable piece of historical patchwork"; the limitation having reference, it would seem, to the Prince's adventures in Prussia, for the filling up of which Mr. Lang "has had recourse to something very like what he himself sneers at as second-hand chatter." "It is a terrible study of character," says the Daily News.

"The Way of Marriage." By Violet Hunt. (Chapman & Hall.)

"For, of course," writes the National Observer, "the book is clever, clever through and through, though we are haunted in most of the tales by the sense that the author is not doing herself justice, albeit our admiration for her brilliance teaches our criticism patience, and whispers to us that the fault is in her subject and not in her. The Way of Marriage is . . . very far behind A Hard Woman." "The candour that physics these illusions [men's illusions, that is, with respect to women] away," says the Pall Mall, "would be very well in moderation, but to be drugged with it overmuch is not only unpleasant, but questionably beneficial." The author is counselled to take her gifts more seriously; to employ them more deliberately; and to do "the larger, nobler, and more comprehensive work for which she has shown herself amply qualified." "It is a stupid, shallow, sordid world," says the Daily News, "that Miss Hunt introduces us to. The presentation is clever, even brilliant, but it is not convincing. . . . The most striking sketch . . . is 'The Story of Mrs. Arne.' The conception is imaginative of 'a body that lives and moves without a soul.'" "On the whole," the Chronicle pronounces, "Miss Hunt has not quite done herself justice in this volume."

NOTICE.

Although the printing order of the ACADEMY has been increased week by week to meet the demand, the issue for January 30 was sold out within a few hours of publication. Owing to the length of time necessary for the preparation of the Portrait Supplement, it was not practicable to publish a second edition: consequently many persons were unable to procure copies. A considerable addition has been made to the printing order of the present issue to prevent a recurrence of the circumstance.

POEMS. By Samuel Waddington. Fcap. 8vo. 4s.

"Mr. Samuel Waddington's poems are the work of a writer who is already known by one or two volumes of agreeable sonnets."—Times.
"A small book of real poetry. Each poem has a charm of its own."—Liverpool Mercury.

"If we measure Mr. Waddington's worth by the bulk of his work, we shall say he is a minor poet. But if we happen to dip into his work, we shall joy as did Keats on coming across Chapman's Homer. Mr. Waddington has yet but a small public although he has written sonnets amongst the best of the century."—New Age.

"In all the work the craftsmanship is accomplished and sure, in a calm, classical manner; cold it may be, but always touched with dignity and elevation of feeling."—Scotsman.

PENS AND PENCILS.

A pocket pen—namely, a pen containing nib and automatic ink supply, is a convenience; but only if one can be quite sure that it will not, on occasion, fill the pocket with ink through the feed-hole. A fountain pen saves the trouble of dipping, enables the user to have his own pen always at hand without the necessity of having recourse to his desk, and saves persons who have to write away from home the disagreeableness of using strange nibs. The objections to a pocket fountain pen are the tendency already mentioned to spill the ink, and the necessity of shaking the ink down on to the nib before the pen can be used.

THE CAW FOUNTAIN PEN dispenses with both these objections. It cannot be put away without being hermetically closed; it can be carried in any position, and subjected to any amount of shaking, and not one drop of ink can, by any possibility, get out of it. The nib—which is a gold one of fine quality, and can be selected to suit any hand—is carried actually in the ink, and the pen is thus ready for use the moment it touches the paper. The price is 12s. 6d.

From the foregoing remarks it will be seen that the CAW FOUNTAIN PEN has all the advantages of a stylographic pen, with the additional one of having a nib instead of a style point, so that one writes one's own hand with it; but for people who still prefer a stylograph, the same Company makes the CAW STYLOGRAPHIC PEN. It is better than any other style of stylographic pen ever made, and is, in fact, a perfect ink pencil. The price is 5s.

And now about Pencils. About half the lead of an ordinary lead pencil is wasted in cutting the cedar, about two-thirds of the lead of an ordinary coloured pencil is wasted in the same way, and by breaking while in use. In either case, the point of a pencil, whether black or coloured, is troublesome to make, and, except in the hands of a few skilful persons, irregular and unsightly. THE BLAISDELL SELF-SHARPENING PENCIL is not made of wood at all; it is just like an ordinary pencil, but the lead is covered with paper, and by an ingenious device it can be resharpened by simply pulling off a little of the paper. The sharpening is absolutely automatic; you cannot take off too much or too little of the cover; it is always just right. The point is easily made perfectly symmetrical, and beautifully tapered. There is no possibility of the lead being broken in sharpening, because the lead has only to be lightly touched. The lead is round instead of being square, as in many lead pencils, so that there are no awkward corners to disfigure the writing.

Nobody who has to use a blue pencil, or any coloured pencil, would ever be content with an ordinary one after using a BLAISDELL pencil; and the BLAISDELL black lead pencil is also better than any ordinary black lead pencil ever made. Samples of each kind of pencils will be sent post free, on receipt of 1s., to any address in the United Kingdom by the BLAISDELL PAPER PENCIL CO., 46, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C. British Depot for the CAW pens.

JOHN LANE begs to announce the publication on February 12th of THE QUEST of the GOLDEN GIRL: a romance by RICHARD LE GALLIENNE, of which in the United States two large Editions have already been exhausted, while a Third is just ready. The following are a few of the American Press Notices:—

"Holds the reader's attention from beginning to end."
Chicago Chronicle.

"Charm is the word which best describes the pervading quality of this book."—The Critic.

"The poet's prose contains many touches of wit, humour and pathos."—San Francisco Bulletin.

"So alive with joyous, buoyant spirit, that one cannot but read with enjoyment.... Nothing that has come from this writer's pen has seemed so likely to achieve widespread popularity."—Hartford Post.

"This book is the most entertaining and best thing that Mr. Le Gallienne has done."—Evening Sun.

"Mr. Le Gallienne has a style—there can be no question about that.
Old sayings turn up in new dress, and new ones rival them in quaintness and originality."—Boston Journal.

12 Full-Page Illustrations by Henry Sandham. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

Appended are a few of the AMERICAN PRESS NOTICES.

"The literary event of the year.... 'Tis verily a book worth re-reading.... I have read various long laudatory reviews, and none of his praisers have done this author full justice."—New York Press.

"The book of the year.... The quaint old English style in which the story is told gives it an added and peculiar charm."—Boston Transcript.

"The notable novel of the year. Since 'Lorna Doone' there has been no sweeter story than this."—Rochester Post.

"Mr. Stimson has achieved a marked literary success, sure to prove one of the events of the bookmaking year. One of the strongest and most picturesque novels of the year."—Brooklyn Eagle.

THE WISE and the WAYWARD: a Novel.

By G. S. STREET, Author of "The Autobiography of a Boy."
Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

"Seldom do we find a storyteller whose style and thought are in such perfect harmony. Clever one feels it to be throughout. Mr.
Street, in fact, is master of a rare simplicity, which is not the baldness of inattention or ostentation, but a subtle directness, possessed of that indefinable, somewhat, distinction."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"Mr. Street has given us a novel of rare distinction and charm....
The fitness of his execution yields as much artistic and literary delight as the delicacy of his perceptions and the acuteness of his analysis."—Daily Telegraph.

"A work of rare and distinguished art."—Woman.

GOD'S FAILURES. By J. S. FLETCHER, Author of "When Charles the First was King." Crown 8vo 3s. 6d. net.

"A writer who can conceive a good story and tell it beautifully."

"The stories show considerable dramatic feeling and constructive ability."—Pall Mall Gazette.

THE SENTIMENTAL VIKINGS. By R. V.

RISLEY. Post 8vo, coloured edges, 2s. 6d. net.

"All the stories arrest the reader's attention and bear witness to a very fresh and genuine talent in their author."—Manchester Guardian.

WEIGHED in the BALANCE: a Novel. By

HARRY LANDER. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

"A novel involving the interest of 'Capital and Labour'; its early chapters savour of both 'John Halifax' and 'Put Yourself in His Place.' Full of unexpected and varied incident of a kind likely to meet with general appreciation."—Daily M.

price 6s.

GWEN and GWLADYS:

A Story of Old Welsh Village Life. By WILLIAM REES, D.D. (Gwilym Hiraethog). Translated from the Welsh by W. REES EVANS.

"A most delightful study of old Welsh village life and character. The narrative takes the form of reminiscences of 'an old Welsh tailor from a country parish in North Wales.' There is something very invigorating, some breath of fresh and uncontaminated air, about these pages to any one who has sickened of the 'Problem-novel' and other modern fare usually provided for us by the modern publisher."—Public Opinion.

"Dr. William Rees' reminiscences, which appeared originally in a Welsh newspaper, are full of a humour and pathos that were well worth translation into the English tongue."—Morning Leader.

NEW VOLUME OF FAIRY TALES.

In crown 8vo, cloth, price 6s., Illustrated.

PRINCES THREE and SEEKERS SEVEN.

Four Fairy Tales by MARY COLQUHOUN. Illustrated by Emily Barnard.

"There are enchantment and delight in these simply told tales for little readers. Miss Colquhoun knows the precise measure of the comprehension of those for whom she writes, and she does not overtax it. The illustrations, by Emily Barnard, are pretty drawings."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"Full of incident, marvellous and otherwise..... Will be eagerly read."—Daily News.

"Four capital fairy stories, which might be read with pleasure by people of any age."—Standard.

NEW NOVELS.

In crown 8vo, cloth, price 3s. 6d.

TALES of BLACK COUNTRY LIFE.

By DAVID HOBBS.

"What has been called the 'literature of locality' receives a pleasing addition in 'Tales of Black Country Life,' by David Hobbs. These tales may be commended as an interesting presentation of the working class among our Scottish ironfields."—Dundee Advertiser.

In crown 8vo, cloth, price 6s.

A MIXED WORLD.

A Novel. By ADOLPHUS POHL, Author of "Thomas Brown's Will."

"The story is a good one, but the chief charm is in the splendid little character-studies with which it abounds, and the smart way in which the writer presents the truest social difficulties."—Western Daily Mercury.

NEW VOLUMES OF VERSE.

In crown 8vo, cloth, price 5s.

THE HUIA'S HOMELAND,

And other Verses. By ROSLYN.

In crown 8vo, cloth, price 5s.

POEMS of LOVE and NATURE.

By CHARLES W. CAYZER, B.A.

"A refreshing oasis in the unprofitable desert of minor poets' effusions."—Public Opinion.

"Elegant in form and scholarly in expression."

"The author has much facile grace of rhyming and command of different metres, and in the pages of his book is much of pretty fancy and deftness of lyrical expression."

Glasgow Evening Citizen.

SUMMER DAYS for WINTER

EVENINGS. A Series of Nature Idylls. Illustrations by John Williamson. Handsomely bound, large crown 8vo, 6s. 6d. net.

The Times.—"With Mr. Crawford's delightful sketches, sometimes telling alone of nature's aspects, sometimes with a thread of story to lend a touch of human interest, a reader must have little imagination if he does not speedily forget the tempest that beats against the casement and fancy himself between green earth and blue sky watching the kaleidoscope of the seasons and the changes of the year and the ways of furred and feathered creatures which are so sympathetically described."

THE WILD LIFE of SCOTLAND.

Illustrations by John Williamson. Handsomely bound, large crown 8vo, 6s. 6d. net.

The Spectator.—"This is a very delightful as well as informing book, which, in respect of style, recalls Thoreau rather than either Jefferies or Burroughs. Altogether this book, which belongs to the rare order that can be taken up at any moment and easily read in instalments, is by far the best and most convenient hand-book to Scottish Natural History—in the most comprehensive sense of the word—that has ever been published."

"The best book on the subject."—Pall Mall Gazette

PIONEERS of EVOLUTION.

From Thales to Huxley. By EDWARD CLODD,
Author of "Story of Creation," &c.

Illustrated with Portraits in Photogravure of Charles Darwin, Prof. Huxley, Mr. Alfred Russel Wallace, and Mr. Herbert Spencer.

TIMES.—"We are always glad to meet Mr. Clodd. He is never dull; he is always well informed, and he says what he has to say with clearness and precision. . . . The interest intensifies as Mr. Clodd attempts to show the part really played in the growth of the doctrine of evolution by men like Wallace, Darwin, Huxley, and Spencer. . . . We commend the book to those who want to know what evolution really means."

DAILY CHRONICLE.—"Masterly. . . . Mr. Clodd's book furnishes an important contribution to a liberal education."

SCOTSMAN.—"Cannot but prove welcome to fair-minded men. . . . To read it is to have an object-lesson in the meaning of evolution. It sets forth with astonishing brevity, precision, and force the history of the uncompromising opposition offered by the Churches of the Middle Ages to the promulgation, even in whispers, of scientific doctrine. . . . There is no better book on the subject for the general reader. . . . No one could go through the book without being both refreshed and newly instructed by its masterly survey of the growth of the most powerful idea of modern times."

ACADEMY.—"Mr. Clodd's is probably the first attempt that has been made to estimate Huxley among his peers. It has succeeded, excellently. . . . Altogether the book could hardly be better done. It is luminous, lucid, orderly, and temperate."

Crown 8vo, cloth, 5s. net.

THE FIRST TWO VOLUMES OF

Mr. Grant Allen's Historical Guides.

PARIS and FLORENCE.

"I desire to supply the tourist who wishes to use his travels as a means of culture with such historical and antiquarian information as will enable him to understand, and therefore to enjoy, the architecture, sculpture, painting, and minor arts of the towns he visits."

Extract from the Introduction.

TIMES.—"Good work in the way of showing students the right manner of approaching the history of a great city."

DAILY NEWS.—"They do not in any way compete with 'Murray' or 'Baedeker,' but will be found useful supplements to them. . . . The idea seems to us a good one, and these guide-books will be found very helpful and suggestive by all leisurely and painstaking travellers."

DAILY TELEGRAPH.—"Exactly fulfil what is claimed for them by the observant and industrious compiler."

SCOTSMAN.—"Those who travel for the sake of culture will be well catered for in Mr. Grant Allen's new series."

BIRMINGHAM GAZETTE.—"Not only admirable, but also, to the intelligent tourist, indispensable. . . . Both books are distinctly interesting to the ordinary reader, whether he have travelled or not."

Mr. L. F. Austin in the SKETCH.—"His 'Paris' is certainly an admirable example of what a purely aesthetic handbook should be, for it is clearly arranged, and written with that ease and intimacy which are born of sympathy and knowledge."

* Notwithstanding the undoubted wonder of the archaeological finds of recent years, the greatest wonder, and the greatest number in the way of 'finds,' is in the region of Early Christian Literature. Some of these finds made nothing short of a sensation when they came; but their value was great enough to outlive it. Now, all these Early Christian works have been gathered together, translated by competent scholars, and edited by Professor Menzies. Those of us who, at much labour and some expense, gathered editions and translations of these many works as they appeared will grudge the labour now. For this is better in every individual case, having profited by all the books that went before; and it is most convenient to have them all in one.

GEORGE JOHN ROMANES.

Essays by George John Romanes. Edited by C. Lloyd Morgan. (Longmans & Co.)

"ECCE ITERUM CRISPINUS!" Yet another posthumous publication of the writings of George Romanes! No doubt the editor of this small volume heartily desired to add to the fame of one to whom he seems to have been warmly attached. But many of the late Professor's sincere friends, we think, and some of them we know, will regret the appearance of this collection of fugitive essays, even though made in obedience to the wish of their deceased author. We confess with regret that we cannot believe the desire we have above attributed to the editor will be justified by this publication.

There are ten essays, the date of the original publication of which ranges from September, 1879 (on "Recreation"), to March, 1891 (on "The Muzzling Order"). These, with others on "Hypnotism," "The Object of Life," "The Differences between Man and Woman," and "Primitive Natural History" appear to us to hardly demand criticism in our columns. We will therefore confine ourselves to Prof. Romanes's essay on the subject he had most at heart, and to which he consecrated his most serious and prolonged labours—namely, the mental difference between "Man and Brute," "The Origin of Human Faculty," and the question of "Instinct."

It is the last of these subjects which appears to us to be the most interesting and most deserving notice; first, because an adequate estimate of instinct is, we believe, the key to the whole question of comparative psychology, and secondly, because the editor is himself a most competent authority as regards animal psychology, and last year added to his previous works a goodly volume on Habit and Instinct.

Prof. Romanes's essay on this subject was published in the Nineteenth Century in September, 1884, and (with the piety which was characteristic of him) he entitled it "The Darwinian Theory of Instinct," while (with the honesty which, to his eternal honour, was more characteristic of him still) he draws out with perfect fairness some of the obvious difficulties which beset the hypothesis of his venerable, and then recently deceased, friend.

Mr. Darwin's theory attributed instinct partly to lapsed intelligence and partly to natural selection; small accidental, but beneficial, changes of habit being preserved in the struggle for life.

Now all thinkers are agreed that animals have some true power of cognition, enough to account for those small changes in instinctive action that will take place when the environment in which an animal finds itself differs inconsiderably from that which is normal to its species. But new habits formed in consequence of such animal acts of cognition will not account for the origin of new instincts, unless acquired characters can be inherited. We by no means affirm that such inheritance is impossible; yet the most convinced, determined and strenuous advocate of "Natural Selection" we have (Prof. Weismann) does deny it. But if we grant that an intelligent response and modification of habit in accord with new circumstances can be inherited, how could intelligence ever enable an insect to act in such a way as to ensure the future welfare of a progeny she will never see, by laying up for it a store of food of a kind utterly useless to herself? On the other hand, is it credible that a series of merely accidental changes in habit could have brought about the long series of varied actions severally appropriate to successively arising conditions of life, such, e.g., as those which Mr. Lloyd Morgan has himself detailed in his last published volume? The more the phenomena of instinct are studied, the more, we are convinced, will it become questionable whether either intelligence (actual or lapsed) or parental instruction, or imitation, or reflex action, or natural selection will account for them.

Many insects when in danger will assume a quiescent condition which has been termed "shamming dead," and this was considered a formidable difficulty in the way of Mr. Darwin's theory, because, as Romanes says, "it is impossible to understand how any insect can have acquired the idea either of death or of its intentional simulation."

But Darwin ascertained that these insects did not, while thus quiescent, put their limbs into the posture they naturally fell into when really dead. To our mind their quiescence is not a whit less wonderful on that account; and as to other animals higher in the scale, Romanes says (p. 50):

"From the evidence which I have I find it impossible to doubt that certain birds, foxes, wolves, and monkeys, not to mention some other and more doubtful cases, exhibit the peculiarity of appearing dead when captured by man. As all these animals are highly locomotive, we cannot here attribute the fact to protective causes."

He deals also very impartially with the curious instincts that some birds (such as partridges, ducks, and plovers) have which leads them to pretend to be wounded, flapping along the ground with an apparently broken wing, in order to favour the escape of their young brood. As to this Prof. Romanes says:

"The difficulty here, of course, is to understand how the birds can have acquired the idea of pretending to have a broken wing, for the occasions must be very rare on which any bird has seen a companion thus wounded followed by a carnivorous quadruped; and even if such observations on their part were of frequent occurrence, it would be difficult to accredit the animals with so high a degree of reasoning power as would be required for them intentionally to imitate such movements. When I consulted Mr. Darwin with reference to this difficulty, he gave me a provisional hypothesis by which it appeared to him that it might be met. He said that anyone might observe, when a hen has a brood of young chickens and is threatened by a dog, that she will alternately rush at the dog and back again to the chickens. Now, if we could suppose that under these circumstances the mother bird is sufficiently intelligent to observe that when she runs away from the dog she is followed by the dog, it is not impossible that the maternal instinct might induce her to run away from her brood in order to lead the dog away from it. If this happened in any case, natural selection would tend to preserve those mother birds which adopt this device. I give this explanation as the only one which either Mr. Darwin or myself has been able to suggest. It will be observed, however, that it is unsatisfactory, inasmuch as it fails to account for the most peculiar feature of the instinct—I mean the trailing of the apparently wounded wing."

Another most remarkable instinct is that of certain kinds of wasp of the genus Sphex, which hunt and sting certain other insects and spiders, so as not to kill but to paralyse them and then bury them alive with their eggs so as to serve as an unresisting prey for their grubs when hatched. Now the curious thing is, that different victims of this kind have to be stung very differently in order to produce the requisite paralysis. The spider must be stung in the middle of its body, the grasshopper must be stung in three successive spots, and a caterpillar in nine.

How such a complex diversity of instincts could have arisen by either natural selection or intelligence on the part of the wasps is a problem indeed. As to this, Prof. Romanes says (p. 54):

"On my consulting Mr. Darwin in reference to these astonishing facts, he wrote me the following letter: 'Bees show so much intelligence in their acts that it seems not improbable to me that the progenitors [of Sphex] originally stung caterpillars and spiders, &c., in any part of their bodies, and then observed by their intelligence that if they stung them in one particular place their prey was at once paralysed. It does not seem to me at all incredible that this action should then become instinctive, i.e. memory transmitted from one generation to another . . . The development of the larvæ may have been subsequently modified in relation to its half dead, instead of wholly dead, prey; supposing that the prey was at first quite killed, which would have required much stinging. Turn this over in your mind, &c.'

"I confess [adds Prof. Romanes] that this explanation does not appear to me altogether satisfactory, although it is, no doubt, the best explanation that can be furnished on the lines of Mr. Darwin's theory."

We fear we must add "bad is that best." But it is very interesting for us thus to be taken behind the scenes and made acquainted with the familiar converse between the venerable biologist and his young disciple.

We have only space to add a few words concerning the two essays from the North American Review (which are devoted to the task of comparing the mind of man with that of animals), and that on "The Origin of Human Faculty." Little, indeed, need be said, because they are all three hardly more than an anticipation (in the first two of these essays), or a reproduction (in the third) of arguments urged by him in his work entitled Mental Evolution in Man, which was published in 1888. In the first of these three essays (the third in the book), entitled "Man and Brute," the author begins by making certain assumptions which we cannot but deem open to serious criticism. Thus he assumes that the process of organic evolution has been continuous throughout up to man. But is it possible for anyone to be quite sure that there is no breach of continuity between organisms which have no power of sensation and those which are capable of it? Let the transition from insentient to sentient creatures appear to be ever so gradual, that is no proof of the absence of an hiatus. Absolute interruptions do occur in nature, and one of them is the discontinuity between the condition of a lifeless crystal and any being possessing vitality. Can we then be confident there is no hiatus between beings which can give no external sign that they possess abstract ideas and beings who, like all known races of men, express highly abstract ideas by words or by gestures? Analogous objections cannot but suggest themselves to every thoughtful mind with respect to Prof. Romanes's other a priori assumptions.

He makes one very remarkable statement (p. 66), saying (quite truly) that "Aristotle and Buffon held that brutes differ from men in having no power of mental apprehension," but he adds that their dictum may be sufficiently met by a remark of De la Malle, who said: "Si les animaux n'étaient pas susceptibles d'apprendre les moyens de se conserver, les espèces se seraient anéanties."

But surely the observation of this French sage is a very peculiar one, for if it applies at all, it applies throughout life from birth onwards. According to him, then, animals had to learn how to live, and then go on living afterwards. The sucking of the infant, the pecking of the newly hatched chick, and the nutritious properties of the leaves whereon some insects' eggs must be laid, have all to be learnt first, and the beneficial practical consequences are to come afterwards! It is wonderful that such a statement should have been ever written, but much more wonderful that Prof. Romanes should have quoted it in the supposition that it alone sufficed to overpower the authority of both Buffon and Aristotle!

But our space is exhausted, and we must reluctantly conclude. The late Prof. Romanes was a man of much personal charm and exceptional intellectual gifts.

He deserves to be remembered with appreciation and esteem, and for this very reason we end, as we began, by saying that we regret the publication of this volume of essays.

THE HAZLITTS.

Four Generations of a Literary Family. The Hazlitts in England, Ireland, and America, 1725-1896. By W. Carew Hazlitt. In 2 vols. (George Redway.)

"I REMEMBER poor Byron, Trelawney, Hobhouse, and myself dining with Cardinal Mezzocaldo at Rome," Captain Sumph began, "and we had some Orvieto wine for dinner, which Byron liked very much. And I remember how the Cardinal regretted that he was a single man. We went to Civita Vecchia two days afterwards, where Byron's yacht was—and, by jove, the Cardinal died within three weeks; and Byron was very sorry, for he rather liked him."

"A devilish interesting story, Sumph, indeed," Waggs said.

"You should publish some of those stories, Captain Sumph, you really should," said Shandon. "Such a volume would make our friend Bungay's fortune."

It is to be hoped that these two portly volumes may prove the making of "somebody's" fortune. To be sure, 'tis not in mortals to command success; but Mr. Carew Hazlitt has done more than this—if Captain Shandon may be credited, he has so written as to deserve it. At frequent intervals in vol. i., and on almost every page of vol. ii., Mr. Hazlitt Sumphises much after this fashion:

"Of Charles Wells, the solicitor, I retain a tolerably vivid remembrance. He is understood to have composed the affectionate epitaph on Hazlitt in St. Anne's, Soho. Wells had, no doubt, a reverential regard for Hazlitt. I remember him coming to my father's house in Great Russell-street, opposite the dead wall of the British Museum. It was about 1846, while I was still at Merchant Taylors', and just about the same time we had a visit from George Byron, as he called himself, the reputed son of Byron by the Maid of Athens. I was at home recovering from an attack of brain fever, and, my father being out, I saw Byron, who disgusted me by the small interest he manifested in my sufferings. He was a short, dark man, and, I have been told, remarkably like the poet" (vol. i., p. 160).

Occasionally anecdote is relieved with criticism, the worth of which may be estimated by the following sample:

"In Mr. Du Maurier's Trilby his own student-life and that of some of his friends are evidently portrayed. I think that I could fill in the names. Trilby herself is an idealised model, and the English writer's altogether appears to be a translation—and not a very good one—of the French ensemble, the expression used when a woman poses for the whole figure."

On a modest guess, about a third of the whole work consists of such trivial and desultory jottings. Nor is it merely that Mr. Hazlitt's stories are often found wanting in point and relevance; not seldom they positively offend.

These remarks apply mainly to vol. ii. Vol. i., besides other interesting documents, contains an important series of extracts from a family chronicle compiled by Hazlitt's sister Peggy during the years 1835-1838, which gives, along with many genealogical details, a circumstantial account of the visit of the Hazlitts to the States in 1783. This narrative, though stated to have been written expressly for the use of Hazlitt's son, lay perdu for some unexplained reason until 1844, when it was shown to Mr. Carew Hazlitt by the daughter of the clergyman under whose roof Peggy Hazlitt passed her last years. Though quite unambitious, it evinces the writer's rare mental gifts. The style is clear, lively, and unaffected; the descriptions of nature as faithful and animated as though they had been penned by Dorothy Wordsworth. A delightful picture is given of the Hazlitts' home at Weymouth, near Boston. The house stood girt on three sides by steep hills sloping down almost to the windows, and clad with lofty locust-trees, which in springtime were laden with tresses of yellow laburnum-like blossom. Over the meadow in the summer nights hovered a conflagration of myriads of fire-flies. Humming-birds of several kinds beset the peach-tree, and other fowls haunted the pear and other fruit trees of the garden—the blue-bird, the mocking-bird, the red linnet, the Virginia nightingale, the Bob Lincoln (little Willie's favourite), and the American robin.

"On a hill to the eastward stood the church, the road to Boston passing close by it. How often have we stood at the window, looking at my father as he went up the road with William, in his nankeen dress, marching by his side like one that could never be tired."

This love of walking exercise was a life-long trait in Hazlitt.

"Almost all his early excursions in the country," writes Mr. C. Hazlitt, "were made on foot, and Patmore testifies how, at the relatively late date when he became intimate with him, he 'devoured the ground' in walking, and seemed to feel a zest and enjoyment in the exercise."

Hazlitt's American reminiscences were few and faint. He observes somewhere that the taste of the barberries he had plucked as a child, after they had lain under the snow through a long Transatlantic winter, years afterwards still lingered on his palate, like a sixth sense.

As was to be expected, the absurd myth which exhibits Hazlitt in the light of a martyr to the cause of progress is reiterated and insisted on ad nauseam in these volumes. Already in the preface Mr. Hazlitt falls into Erckles' vein—

"It was open to Hazlitt to have followed in the footsteps of several of his literary contemporaries, who improved their fortunes by changing their opinions. But the Loftus blood was in him, and he threw in his lot with the claims of freedom and truth!"

Hence—we are given to understand—the alarms and excursions of "Zeta" and "Ultracrepidarius," who repeatedly told him in unequivocal language that, because his views on liberty of conscience and opinion were new and heretical, "argal his ideas on all other subjects were unworthy of credit or even of serious notice."

The late Mr. Alexander Ireland who, it need scarcely be said, held firmly by the aforesaid myth, contrasts in the Memoir prefixed to his Selections, the treatment experienced by Hazlitt at the hands of the Tory critics, with that Hazlitt himself bestowed on the writers of the Government camp.

"Granted that Hazlitt had taken the unfashionable side, and that his political sympathies were often vehemently expressed, surely the intrinsic ability of his purely literary works might have been acknowledged, and their merits admitted. He himself never failed to do justice to the intellectual gifts of his opponents, however keenly he may have attacked their political tergiversations. Witness what he always said of Coleridge, Wordsworth, and Southey. It is never without a sad feeling, akin to regret, that he attacks what he considers their backslidings. . . . He never carried poisoned arrows into political conflict—such was his chivalrous sense of honour and justice."

Now, on each of these two heads a word has to be said. In the first place, Hazlitt was in no wise a martyr to the cause of progress. For that cause he cared not a jot—indeed, he did not believe in it. He felt no enthusiasm for—in truth, he did not share—the great vital ideas that underlay the revolutionary movement. He scoffed at the notion of human perfectibility, and maintained that the race moves neither forward nor upward, but merely round and round. Hazlitt was no true democrat; he loved the Whigs no better than the Tories, and to the Radicals he cherished an antipathy every whit as strong as his antipathy to Tory and Whig. The truth is—to quote Mr. Leslie Stephen—that "what Hazlitt called his opinions were really his feelings. His politics were simply the expression, in a generalised form, of his intense feeling of personality." His repudiation of the dogma of the divine right of kings was thus but the passionate self-assertion of his egotism. This repudiation, it is true, ranged him for the nonce on the side of the Reformers, and so served to draw down upon him the scurrilous abuse of "Zeta" and the Quarterly; but presently he would be found assailing a Reformer, as he did the arch-Reformer Shelley, so fiercely as to rouse the wrath of Leigh Hunt, and rejoice the heart of Gifford. Not then to zeal for the cause of progress did Hazlitt become a martyr, but simply to the uncontrollable effervescence of an ebullient egotism.

But, secondly, is it true, as Mr. Ireland would fain have us believe, that the judgment wherewith Hazlitt the critic judged his political opponents contrasts favourably with that wherewith he was judged again of the Tory Press? We answer unhesitatingly, No. So far, indeed, is this from the truth, that William Hazlitt's little finger may rather be said to be thicker than his adversaries' loins: whereas they chastise with whips, he chastises with scorpions. As a sample of the Hazlittian process of vivisection, let us take the Edinburgh Review critique on Christabel—an article which Mr. Ireland prudently forbore to include in his extended list of Hazlitt's contributions to that organ. This execrable critique appeared in September, 1816—several months, be it observed, before the adverse notice in the Quarterly of Hazlitt's Characters of Shakespeare's Plays, which he attributed to the "Talking Potato" (J. W. Croker), and of which Mr. Ireland and Mr. Carew Hazlitt complain so bitterly. Doubts have been expressed as to the authorship, but a sentence towards the end sets the matter beyond dispute: "There is not one couplet in the publication before us which would be reckoned poetry, or even sense, were it found in the corner of a newspaper or upon the window of an inn." Hazlitt is thinking of the incident which befell him in the inn-parlour at Linton in 1798—an incident which he has described in the paper entitled My First Acquaintance with Poets, and again alluded to in his Lecture on Thomson and Cowper. Coleridge, John Chester, and Hazlitt had travelled on foot from Stowey to see the Valley of Rocks, and, while breakfasting in the old-fashioned inn-parlour, had found a little worn-out copy of The Seasons lying in the window-seat, on which Coleridge exclaimed: "That is true fame!" Assuming, then, that Hazlitt was the writer, in what spirit did he deal with the poet and his work? Let one reply whose impartiality is above suspicion. Mr. Andrew Lang thus describes the article:

"This odious critique is forgotten, perhaps, because nobody could say that it 'killed' Coleridge. It only killed his hopes of profit and fame (he being poor, ill, and in sad estate) from the most original compositions in the range of English literature. There is no critical vice which the Whig critic does not exhibit. With the blind eye, the deaf ear, the insensible heart are allied gross and mean personal impudence, frequent imputations of insanity, and the wonted political rancour. . . . 'Much of the art of the wild writers consists in sudden transitions. . . . This, indeed, is known to the medical men, who not unfrequently have the care of them, as an unerring symptom.' Under Gilman's care, Coleridge may have reflected on this graceful innuendo. Coleridge 'was in bad health when he wrote Kubla Khan—the particular disease is not given, but the careful reader will form his own conjectures.' 'Persons in this poet's unhappy condition generally feel the want of sleep as the worst of their evils.' The poem is then burlesqued in a prose summary; and the passage, But vainly thou warrest, is said to 'have been manufactured by shaking words together at random,' &c., &c.

Such is the fashion after which Hazlitt "does justice to the intellectual gifts of his political opponents." "But," it will be urged, "the rancour here exhibited is political, not personal; Hazlitt assails Coleridge as the apostate from the cause which he himself had so close at heart, and for which he sacrificed so much." Doubtless the apostasy served as a convenient pretext, but it was not the real cause of Hazlitt's malignity. That dated from Hazlitt's disgraceful escapade at Keswick in the autumn of 1803, when he narrowly escaped being ducked by the populace—there were two hundred men on horseback out in pursuit of him—and probably sent to prison. Coleridge rescued him, giving him all the money he had, and the very shoes off his feet, to enable him to escape over the mountains to Wordsworth, who, in his turn, took him in, gave him clothes and money, and sped him on his way southward. Since that time the two poets, while never declining to meet Hazlitt if they encountered him casually, did not desire that he should be invited to meet them. Hazlitt discovered this, and it angered him; and being, according to Leigh Hunt, one who pocketed up wrongs to draw them out again at a future day, he resolved to lay a rod in pickle for his quondam hosts and good friends. In the fulness of time the Excursion and Christabel appeared; and, the desired opportunity thus offering, the rod was vigorously plied. Perhaps the most valuable document in these volumes is the letter printed on p. 133, vol. i. It is Hazlitt's reply to the vehement expostulation addressed to him by Leigh Hunt on the occasion of his assault on Shelley, and, as a matter of course, it loses much by being printed here apart from what may be called its context—viz., the expostulation in question, and the rejoinder which it elicited from Hunt. These are both given in the Memoirs of 1867.

Of Mr. Carew Hazlitt's astounding—his magnificent—blunders and of his "tales of bawdry" we shall here say nothing. The latter, even were they fresh, would savour ill; and, alas! they have the very sæva mephitis of antiquity on them. What the spirit is that animates his anecdotes may be gathered from the following morceau:

"Frederick Locker, in his parsimonious ways, curiously resembled his relative by marriage, the late Poet Laureate. . . . He gave me a copy of his 'London Lyrics,' with a request that I would send him my written opinion of it. I did so with a certain difficulty, as in a budget of vers de société not of the highest class, one scarcely knew what to say. I remember that Locker characteristically asked me to call for the little volume at a wine-shop in Piccadilly, in which he then had an interest."

HARPER OF SHERBORNE.

A Memoir of H. D. Harper, D.D. By L. V. Lester. (Longmans & Co.)

MR. LESTER'S book is free from the two besetting sins of biographies: it is free from trivial personal details, and it is free from masses of dull correspondence. But the author has done more than merely abstain from boredom. He has recorded the life-work of a successful toiler in a great profession in the way in which such a life-work should be recorded, for he has throughout subordinated the person of whom he writes to the work that person did. And if we are told what a man did, and how he did it, we learn all we need know about the man himself. This memoir, then, does what every memoir of a worker in some special department of human activity should aim at doing, and should be content with doing. It suggests to those engaged in similar operations what to emulate, and what to avoid; it points out the difficulties that may be expected, and how those difficulties may be overcome. Anyone at all conversant with the annals of our public schools will recognise that the chequered history of Sherborne, as sketched in Mr. Lester's second chapter, is typical of the spasmodic and kaleidoscopic history of English schools in general.

In our higher education there has been no continuous and regular advance all along the line. Progress in one quarter has been followed by collapse—collapse in another by progress; effort here has been counterbalanced by slumber there. The vicissitudes through which our schools have passed may be seen from the remarkable fluctuations in their numbers. In 1778 the Rugby roll stood at 52, by 1790 it had risen to 245, by 1807 it had fallen to 120, by 1816 it had increased to 381, by 1827 it had gone down to 123, by 1842 Arnold had raised it to 375, and five years after, under Tait, it reached nearly 500. So, too, at Westminster, the 300 of 1821 had in 1841 sunk to 67, and as recently as 1846 Harrow could muster but 78. If this oscillation could take place in the case of a wealthy foundation such as Rugby has been for the last 120 years, what may be looked for in the case of poorly endowed schools whose existence almost depends upon the character of their head masters, and whose financial reserve is too scanty to enable them to withstand the blow inflicted by an unfortunate appointment?

Now and again we see individual schools, schools that enjoy no particular advantages in the shape of endowments, lifted by strong men, by Hileys or Valpys, by Harpers or Thrings, from prostration and obscurity to efficiency and fame: and, too often, in turn we see the labours of the school-maker reft of permanent results by the heritage falling to a weak or a foolish successor. Naturally any public school must be affected more or less by the personality of its head master. Still, if it has sufficient pecuniary resources to place it above the possibility of financial difficulty, it is not absolutely at the mercy of the personal qualities of the man in office for the time being. A public institution is a thing for all time, and should be placed beyond the risk of shipwreck at the hands of a chance and temporary official.

Mr. Lester's account of what went on at Sherborne under Harper's administration presents us with a type of the English public school, and a type of the vigorous head master; a type of the obstacles that confront such men, and a type of the manner in which they surmount them; a type of the measure of success attainable, and a type of the character of that success; all of which roughly represents, in a general way, very much what goes on in a desultory and sporadic fashion in the haphazard system—if system it can be called—of our secondary education.

Sherborne was not Harper's first headship. In 1847, at the age of twenty-six, he became head master of Cowbridge School, to which post he was appointed, as head masters usually are in this country, on the lucus a non lucendo principle—that is, on the strength of their innocence of any knowledge or experience of school work. It is true that if he had proved a failure at Cowbridge he could have done but little harm, for there were scarcely a dozen boys in the school; but in this instance the simple and child-like confidence of the governors happened, accidentally, so far as they were concerned, to be justified by the event. In 1850 the twelve boys had become eighty, and the school was so evidently in good condition that the governing body of Sherborne were fully warranted in choosing him that year to rule their foundation. He found at Sherborne two boarders (there had been 100) and thirty-eight day boys, while thirty lads went with him from Cowbridge. This was not a dazzling beginning, but Harper had learnt that he possessed the gift of mastership, and showed his belief in himself by at once setting to work considerably to enlarge the buildings he had not yet filled. The numbers did not rise with striking rapidity; for some years they even fluctuated, and during that period the financial strain was very great. By 1870, however, the two original boarders were represented by 209, and the day boys swelled the list to 257. Seven years later his three decades of scholastic toil came to an end, and his acceptance of the Principalship of his old College of Jesus, at Oxford, brought him fresh, but less arduous, duties.

As Mr. Lester says, "Sherborne was the real work of Harper's life." In the correspondence given in the Memoir, rather amusing is the sturdy, yet canny, way in which Harper dealt with the fond enthusiast who pestered him to introduce Hebrew as a compulsory subject throughout the school from the bottom to the top. On the other hand, in the letters that passed between Harper and Dr. Temple relative to the Endowed Schools Bill, the cobweb of sentiment, sophistry, and special pleading woven by the former was hopelessly rent and brushed aside by the broad, strong, luminous common sense of the Head Master of Rugby. Of that Bill Mr. Lester's third chapter gives an excellent summary, in which Sherborne is taken merely as the peg on which to hang an account of the whole question. In his fifth chapter he points out, with truth, that although it was Thring who originated the Head Masters' Conference, it was to Harper that the success of the society was mainly due; and in chap. vii. he tells of the active part taken by the subject of his Memoir, when Principal of Jesus, in the partial unfettering of the college from its Keltic bonds. Schoolmasters who do not know, and who wish to know, the main lines on which the history of the public schools has proceeded during the last half century, cannot do better than read this book. We have only to add that a portrait of Harper would have been a pleasing, and an index a useful, addition to the volume.

THE CITY OF CHESTER.

A History of the Ancient City of Chester. By George Lee Fenwick. (Chester: Philliphson & Golder.)

WITH the beginning of English history begins the history of Chester. Deva, the colony on the Dee, or Caer-legio, the camp of the legion, as the hybrid British jargon had it, was the ultimate outpost of Roman dominion in the north-west. Planted there at the head of the great military road of Watling-street, it served to overawe the Brigantes of Lancashire and Yorkshire and the Silures of Wales. The relics and inscribed monuments of the "Vicesima Legio Valeria Victrix" are thick within its walls. And when the Romans went and in time the new military despotism of the Normans took their place, then Chester became for two centuries the seat of a succession of warrior earls, warders of the marches, who ruled as petty kings in the Palatinate. As England grew quiet and the need for the strong hand of Randal Blundeville and the rest ceased, it was high time for the city, here as elsewhere, to assert its independence. Nor shall you find a finer specimen of the mediæval municipality than this, with its innumerable charters, with the great abbey of St. Werburgh in its midst, with its rich and powerful trade guilds, to whose annual Whitsuntide festivities the antiquarians love to trace the origins of the English drama. The glory of Chester has departed, yet as one comes upon it in the train, half an hour from the adust skies and the redolent canal of Manchester, with its towers of red sandstone and its girdle of cherry orchards, it is hard not to think of it as still in some measure, as of old, a citadel and outwork against the barbarians. Such a city may well be proud of its past, and it is not surprising to find that the antiquities of Chester and its neighbourhood attract many and earnest students. It is not long since Mr. Helsby brought Ormerod's History of Cheshire up to date in a new edition. Two years ago came Canon Rupert Morris's Chester under the Plantagenets and Tudors, and now we have what seems at first sight an even more ambitious undertaking in this sumptuous quarto of 578 pages by Mr. Fenwick. We may, however, as well confess at once that Mr. Fenwick's work is a grievous disappointment. It has evidently been a labour of love, to which the author has devoted an exemplary enthusiasm and a copious industry; but it is equally evident that he has not approached his task with an adequate knowledge of the method to be employed or an adequate scholarly equipment. There is only one way in which a history of Chester can really be written to-day, and that is by constant reference to the Corporation records. These are unusually full; they were carefully arranged by Mr. J. C. Jeaffreson in 1878, and, except by Canon Morris, they have hardly been ransacked at all. But of the records, or even of Canon Morris's researches, Mr. Fenwick has not, so far as we can tell, made any substantial use. As a result his History adds but little to our knowledge; at best it is a compilation, differing principally in bulk from what may be found in the guide-book of any petty town. And even as a compiler Mr. Fenwick leaves much to be desired. He never, and it is the worst sin of a writer on such a subject as this, gives a reference. He gaily quotes "the Harleian MS." or "a MS. in the British Museum." His knowledge of modern literature may be measured by six astounding lines on Arthur Hugh Clough; his knowledge of ancient literature by his mention of a play of Plautus as the Mostella. We have no wish to be hard on mere slips, and as such we are willing to take the statement that Arthur, Prince of Wales, gave a charter to the Bakers' Company in the reign of Edward VI.; but Mostella too clearly has its origin in an ignorant inference from an abbreviated reference. As a specimen of Mr. Fenwick's treatment of an archaeological subject it will be fair to take his explanation of the famous Chester Rows. Of these he says:

"In the first quarter of the present century Hemingway suggested that the Rows were the result of lowering the main streets, probably by the Roman garrison. Within the last few years Dr. Brushfield followed on similar lines, and asserted that the formation of the Chester Rows began in the thirteenth century, and that the Rows themselves represent the accumulations of the intervening period, the streets being kept to their original level. We venture to agree with the two latter writers on some points. . . . It was decided, probably in the Plantagenet period, for some reason to ease the gradients of the four main streets by lowering the crown of the eminence upon which the city stood, and which was then highest at the Cross."

Mr. Fenwick makes us rub our eyes. Does he really not see that the two theories which he treats as identical are in reality as precisely opposed to each other as two theories could be? And as to the alternative which he himself adopts, Canon Morris, who has an excellent discussion of the subject, would have told him that the level of the present main streets can be clearly established by surveying to be the level of the Roman work also. Even more unsatisfactory is Mr. Fenwick's account of the Chester Mysteries. He repeats the traditional story of their composition by Randall Higden, without any reference to the half-dozen serious difficulties which beset that story; and on three different pages he gives three different dates for the last performance of the plays—1574 on p. 377, 1575 on p. 493, and 1577 on p. 435. We regret to be obliged to form so unfavourable an estimate of such an honest and well-intentioned book as Mr. Fenwick's; and we hasten to add that, weak as he is on points of archaeology, in which the main interest of any account of Chester must necessarily consist, he has yet given an excellent popular account of the buildings and institutions of the city, and of the important part which it has played in national history.

ANCIENT IDEALS.

A Study of Intellectual and Spiritual Growth from Early Times to the Establishment of Christianity. In 2 vols. By Henry Osborn Taylor. (Putnam.)

AN attractive title to a work containing a still more attractive table of contents, and consisting of more than 850 pages, led us to begin reading Mr. H. O. Taylor's book with avidity. The titles of a succession of chapters devoted to an exposition of the noblest thoughts and aspirations of Mankind, from Egypt, Chaldaea, and China, through India, Persia, Greece, and Rome, down to the second century after Christ, shows an aim so lofty that only a writer very exceptionally gifted could be expected to attain it. In his Preface he tells us that his work is "an attempt to treat human development from the standpoint of the ideals of the different races, as these ideals disclose themselves in the art and literature, in the philosophy and religion, and in the conduct and political fortunes of each race."

We must reluctantly confess that the perusal of its pages has caused us much disappointment. We confess this with reluctance, because the author is so evidently actuated by a desire to set before his readers a true, however necessarily fragmentary, sketch of human progress during the vast period his pages refer to, and because, also, he has evidently taken great pains and consulted very many authorities.

Yet the result is a series of chapters the majority of which are regrettably bald and commonplace for the most part, though some are interesting.

But, at the fourth page of the Introduction, we meet with a paragraph which seems to us to strike the keynote of the whole composition. The author says:

"Well-nigh universal is the tradition of impiety resulting in destruction from the gods; Chaldaea has it, and the Hebrew race, and all the Aryan races, likewise the Egyptian, though in Egypt the destruction came not through a deluge. But the "deluge" was very wide or very ancient; Chaldaea, Israel, India, Iran, Greece, and the peoples of America remembered it in tradition."

Any writer who can thus speak about the "deluge" in these days, when no one whose opinion is of any account regards it as more than some local inundation, if not altogether and utterly apocryphal, exhibits thereby an absolutely fatal incompetence as to matters of ancient history and religion.

The author shows himself all through his two volumes to be evidently an earnest advocate of some form of what we in England should call "Nonconformist Christianity." This book must, indeed, be rather regarded as an edifying attempt to view history in a certain pietistic light, than an endeavour to give it that impartial and colourless treatment which can now alone be tolerated by students of history worthy of the subject which they desire to pursue.

His treatment of the moral teaching and theology of Egypt appears to us to be too depreciative, while his description of Chinese ethics is too eulogistic. But we think he well sums up the outcome of the two great schools of Indian religious thought:

"India in Brahmanism, then, with more open eye, in Buddhism, abandoned as worthless, or as painful, the content of men's lives; then, scorning individuality as the veriest mode of change and death, it abandoned the existence of the human individual, the basis of all life, the only means whereby that which transcends the human individual may be reached. . . . Indian thought reaches not conclusions, but catastrophes—the Absolute All-one—Brahma and the Atmā, which was It—was the first leap into the void; the second was Nirvana."

Mr. Taylor's treatment and appreciation of Homer are not unworthy of their subject, but his notice of that other greatest of the Greeks—Aristotle—leaves much to be desired, though he has the merit of making clear, in a few words, the Stagyrte's views as to "pleasure" and the "Summum Bonum."

He is more favourable and indulgent to Lucretius than might have been expected, and his general sketch of Rome, its legal spirit, its instinct for government, and its single philosophy—Stoicism—is to be commended. His judgment of Horace may surprise some of his readers: "If ever," he says, "a man was fitted for preaching morals sound and good, yet not too lofty for the comprehension of men, it was this man of balanced mind."

We do not think Mr. Taylor does justice to the latent tendency towards beliefs and practices analogous to those advocated by Christianity which existed in the later Paganism of Rome. It is undeniable that there was much in Pagan reforms which harmonised with the new belief, and much in ideas and doctrines imported from the East which prepared the way for its reception. The latter, however, Mr. Taylor allows. We feel we must refrain almost entirely from criticising his treatment both of Judaism and the Christian dispensation, on account of the strong convictions which make themselves conspicuous throughout the work, and especially, of course, in those two portions of it. In fact, he states, in the opening of chap. xxii., that "the origin of Christianity cannot be scientifically treated."

Not a few Christians will be surprised to find that he derives one important argument in favour of the objective reality of the resurrection from the fact (as he says) that it produced the conversion of members of Christ's own family—especially of his previously intractable brother James.

In spite of the drawbacks we have been compelled to notice, Mr. Taylor's work will be found useful and valuable by many readers who can make sufficient allowance for its author's special prejudices and consequent shortcomings. We note with regret many clerical errors, especially in Greek orthography, and the work must have careful revision before it reaches a second edition.

ARTS AND CRAFTS.

The Art of the House. By Rosamund Marriott Watson. (George Bell & Sons.)

MRS. MARRIOTT WATSON has written a number of brilliant and witty sentences on a very depressing subject; she has refuted the heresies of plate-glass windows, overmantels, sideboards, cosy corners, dyed grasses, modern clocks, steel fenders, American walnut wood, and a hundred other household monstrosities; she has directed the amateur, with a purse, to search after Spode china, Aubusson carpets, Spanish screens, old linen chests, Dutch and French harpsichords, English corner cupboards, Venetian bed "sets," and other delightful things; she has even ventured to lay down, in her first chapter, some principles of decoration, but—but where is salvation, outside the shops of Bond-street and of the old furniture dealers? where is a living spirit to be found in modern decorative art?

The problem is a difficult one. Of course, it appears superfluous to the rich man whose rooms are filled with the work of past centuries of craftsmen, and whose decorations are carried out en bloc in Louis Quinze or Empire style by Messrs. So and So. Of course, the problem appears ridiculous to ninety-nine out of a hundred men who read the daily chroniclers. But, with few exceptions, all the products of modern craftsmanship are artistically bad. The artist, in fact, has no voice in the productions of the workshop, and so long as this is so, so long will the average furniture, dress, architecture, jewellery, be artistically beneath contempt.

Let us take, for example, the production of the book before us, The Art of the House. It is a book on art—an art book, as the publishers have it—and no doubt the editor of "The Series" in which it appears, "The Connoisseur Series," made an effort after a beautiful format. But what a format for a connoisseur! The difficulties in the way of producing books that are not mechanically printed and bound are almost insuperable. And why? Because the artists have no power to-day in the printer's and bookbinder's crafts. Accordingly, The Art of the House is—what it is! The type used is fairly good, but the leading is quite inappropriate to the type, and the eye only follows the sentences with difficulty. The title-page is atrocious, the size of type being ridiculously large for the size of the page. The illustration on p. 9 is out of balance. There is no originality or beauty in the arrangement or proportions of the headlines, pagination, or contents of chapters. The binding of the book is terra-cotta in hue (because terra-cotta is held by publishers to be an art colour), ruled with eleven brown lines, lettered with the stiff gilt lettering of the British bookbinder. The book has, in short, been mechanically produced; but we have no doubt that if the publishers and bookbinders and printers of The Art of the House are told that in producing it they have simply reproduced a cliché of 999 formats, all in turn clichés of 999 similar formats, they would probably reply, first, "What's the matter with the book?" and, secondly, "The public likes it." And they would have spoken wisdom. The public does like, for its carpets, its houses, its books, its furniture, clichés of a generalised and mediocre format. Further, the great public distrusts originality of design, subtlety of line, delicacy of colour in the wares offered it. And that is why the binding of The Art of the House is ruled with eleven brown lines, and why it is such a slow and difficult process to recall the artists from Burlington House, and place them in the workshops where they ought to be.

We have said that the artists should be recalled from Burlington House, because history tells us that when the old arts of handicraft died, the factories that replaced them did without the artist altogether. For a long—for a very long—time nobody noticed the artist's absence. The average estimable civilisee, as Walt Whitman would say, was as indifferent to the form and colour of his surroundings in 1850 as he is to his own form and colour to-day. But little by little a suspicion crept into some intelligent minds that something was amiss; and at last some extremely intelligent man cried, after years of thought, "But where is the artist?" Where indeed! He had been forgotten, and the hapless creature had stolen away softly to the only corner roped in for him—to the High Art of Picture Painting. As for the other arts that bring beauty into life, they were forgotten, made impossible, scouted; and a couple of generations of artists, who would have been the craftsmen of former ages, employed themselves madly in filling the acreage of the Academy walls. The artist is simply the man who understands the beauty innate in his material, the man who can give a beautiful individuality or character to the work in hand; and though there are many crafts to-day where the machine kills and degrades all the artistic quality of the work, still there are many others—such as the printer's—where the artist should hold a commanding place. But it has been reserved for this nineteenth century to make art ridiculous.

The century that has talked so much "art," and written so much "art," and made a dozen little renaissances in "art," has, in fact, proved to artists that the æsthetic instinct in the average man is the last to awaken and the first to disappear in times unpropitious to art. Not even the moral sense is so precariously placed, so quick to flee! Savage races are, in a sense, true craftsmen, because, in fact, they cannot help doing handiwork, and the element of machine rote does not vulgarise their work; but no doubt the æsthetic instinct is less developed among savages than even among civilised men. But the latter have triumphed, and gone one better than the savage. It looked as though beauty must continue to entwine humbly with human utility—so many ages had not seen these twain dissevered, that Beauty began to hope man had not noticed she was there along with him. But the terrible age came when art was artificialised by the average mind and regarded as something outside daily life. And the day that saw the craftsman banished from the workshop, and the artist hurried away from the common air to the pedestal-strewn platform of the popular imagination, was the day that saw art made ridiculous.

AS OTHERS SEE US.

Le Roman d'un Roi d'Ecosse. Par J. J. Jusserand. (Hachette.)

The Romance of a King's Life. By J. J. Jusserand. Translated by M. R. Revised and Enlarged by the Author. (Fisher Unwin.)

THERE is always something peculiarly graceful and attractive about M. Jusserand's treatment of a literary question. Others may be more learned scholars, more exact philologists, closer students of chronicles and of the unnumbered publications of the Early English Text Society: but certainly no one has a keener eye for the picturesque, or is more apt to disinter the gem of true humanity in the wilderness of erudition. Nor can an English reviewer fail to feel a sentiment of gratitude to the accomplished foreigner who has again and again manifested so flattering a preference for the alien charms of our ruder letters. In the pleasant little treatise now before us, it has been M. Jusserand's object to make bloom once more the rose of the poet prisoner, James I. of Scotland. The story is more or less familiar, from the "The King's Quair" itself, and from Rossetti's fine ballad, "The King's Tragedy." M. Jusserand has given it another exquisite rendering in prose, filling out the bare outlines with an exercise of imagination here perfectly legitimate, because based on a wide knowledge and a sympathetic appreciation of the conditions of fifteenth century life. He has woven into his narrative a description of mediæval Scotland by Bartholomew Anglicus, together with contemporary accounts of three embassies sent at various times from the Continent to James the First. One of these was that of Æneas Sylvius Piccolomini, afterwards Pope Pius II., who came on a rather mysterious mission from the Council at Basle. The other two—that of the poet Alain Chartier and that of Regnault Girard, Seigneur de Bazoges—were concerned with the marriage of Margaret of Scotland to the French Dauphin, one day to become Louis XI. M. Jusserand has made some extracts from the MS. account of Girard's journey, hitherto unpublished, in the National Library of France. One wishes that he had seen his way to giving it in full. We do not quite gather whether Alain Chartier's narrative has been previously printed or not.

The English edition has been enriched with several illustrations, in addition to the beautiful reproduction from Pinturicchio of "Æneas Sylvius Piccolomini before James I. of Scotland," which appears in the French one also. The most interesting is a representation of "The Wheel of Fortune," from a fifteenth-century MS. Various appendices have also been added, containing documents and discussions of points of scholarship. One regrets, however, not to find a fuller treatment of Mr. J. T. T. Brown's iconoclastic onslaught upon the hitherto received ascription of "The King's Quair" to James himself. M. Jusserand tells us that, in his opinion, Mr. Brown's thesis, "though very cleverly defended, is untenable," and refers us for the grounds of this opinion to a letter in a periodical which Mr. Brown has already, to a large extent, destructively answered. We cannot here go into all the rights and wrongs of the matter, and the philological part of Mr. Brown's argument, which suggests a date for the poem as late as the beginning of the sixteenth century, requires careful consideration by a specialist. But we certainly think he has shown that the biographical data of the poem, while they do not agree with the facts of history, do agree with the version of those facts given in the chronicle on which Mr. Brown believes it to be based. These biographical discrepancies are not perhaps so great as to be absolutely conclusive; but, such as they are, M. Jusserand seems to us rather to slur them over. Thus in discussing the question whether the capture of James took place in 1405 or 1406 it is hardly fair to treat the matter as simply a toss up between the respective authority—in neither case worth much—of Wyntoun and of Walsingham. The date 1406, which such excellent modern historians as Sir James Ramsay and Mr. J. H. Wylie agree in accepting, does not rest upon the statement of Walsingham at all, but on the careful examination by Sir William Hardy of the misplaced documents in Rymer's Foedera and of other available records. If M. Jusserand had taken the line of doubting whether this revised date is necessarily inconsistent with the indications of the poem, we should have less quarrel with him upon the point. M. Jusserand is, however, by no means a wholesale swallower of legends. He drops the unsupported and improbable story that Windsor Castle was the scene of James's romantic love for Jane Beaufort; and he points out that the evidence for the immortal deed attributed to "Kate Barlass" is neither early nor altogether unimpeachable. We confess that, if this is a myth, it is one from which we do not willingly part.

SOME THEOLOGICAL BOOKS.

The Gospel for an Age of Doubt. By Henry Van Dyke, D.D., &c. (Macmillan & Co.)

VERY different from the apologetics of either the English or the Scotch foundation is this book, which comprises the Yale Lectures on Preaching for 1896. Although Dr. Van Dyke thinks that the most marked feature of the age is "a profound and widespread unsettlement of soul with regard to fundamental truths of religion," he takes heart at recent recantations like those of Signor Crispi and the late Prof. Romanes, and asserts that this general scepticism is even now fading, and will before long pass entirely away. Nor is he in any uncertainty as to what should be done by the students he addresses to hasten its departure. Not for him are any attempts to reconcile revelation with newly discovered history, or to find by metaphysical speculation an excuse for believing in a benevolent Deity, in face of the difficulty presented by the existence of evil. Better, he says, "to doubt God's personality, His supremacy, His very being, than it is to doubt His eternal goodness, His moral integrity." Yet, but for God's incarnation in Christ modern Christianity could never have existed. For the Incarnation is to him not only an historical fact, but the one fact round which the whole history of man groups itself. And this was as plain in the Apostolic age as in ours. But for the "deep conviction . . . that Jesus Christ, the Son, was the unveiling of His Father, God, and that the Holy Spirit who came upon the disciples was the Spirit of the Father and the Son," the Apostles could never have gone forth into the world to teach all nations, nor would the nations have listened to their teaching. "The early Christians looked at God through Christ: they did not look at Christ through a preconceived idea and a logical definition of God." Hence the preaching of Christ is the one thing needful, "the only gospel that is worth preaching in all ways to all men, that Jesus Christ is God, who loves us in order that we may learn to love one another."

But though this conclusion of Dr. Van Dyke's will probably win the assent of many who will envy him his unquestioning faith, he reaches it by a road strange to English eyes. Nearly all his illustrations are drawn from modern literature, with which he has an intelligent acquaintance rare in a divine. Madame Bovary and Trilby, Baudelaire's Fleurs du Mal and Ibsen's Ghosts, are quoted to show the despairing tone of the age quite as much as Robert Elsmere and the poems of Matthew Arnold. This, indeed, he defends—if it needs any defence—on the sensible ground that the preacher who does not know what his people are reading does not know his people; but it is certainly startling to any one used to the smug decorum of English divinity to read that "there is no more room to doubt that the early Christians saw in Christ a personal unveiling of God than that the friends and followers of Abraham Lincoln regarded him as a good and loyal American citizen of the white race," or to find belief in the personality of God vindicated by a scene from Mr. Prime's Along New England Roads. Yet have we any right to be startled? Are not the Gospels which bear the names of the Evangelists written in most execrable Greek? and did not Charles Kingsley describe the literary style of St. Augustine as that of a field preacher?

These, however, are matters of taste, about which every one is a law unto himself. This apart, Dr. Van Dyke's lectures form one of the most eloquent defences of Christianity that we have yet met with.

Philosophy of Theism: being the Gifford Lectures delivered before the University of Edinburgh in 1895-96. Second Series. By Alexander Campbell Fraser, LL.D., &c. (Blackwood & Sons.)

THESE lectures, delivered by the Emeritus Professor of Logic, form a wonderful feat of strength on the part of one who first entered the university as a student sixty-two years ago. Like his fellow-countryman, Mr. Gladstone, the veteran professor is a convinced believer, and thinks that "morally perfect Power" is "at the root of the physical, æsthetical, and spiritual experience of mankind, although with a background of inevitable mystery." This is the theme which is descanted upon in nearly every one of the lectures, though there are some signs that the lecturer has found himself somewhat hampered by the prohibition imposed by the founder against the use of the lectures for the teaching of the creed of any church or sect. This is how Dr. Fraser deals with the mystery of evil:

"For one thing, for all that we know to the contrary, it may be a sign of perfect goodness that there should be in existence, on educational trial, individual persons who, as persons, must have absolute power to make and keep themselves bad, with all the implied risks, as we might call them, of this divine experiment in personal responsibility . . . rather than that there should not be individual persons thus on moral trial at all, and instead a wholly physical, non-moral, and physically-necessitated universe."

Dr. Fraser writes, as will be seen, rather ad clerum than ad populum, and the unregenerate person who has not acquired the Scotch taste for metaphysics will probably find his book a little dry. Yet his pen has lost none of its ancient fire, and he calls Mr. Herbert Spencer, though with many qualifications and adoucissements, "the philosopher of the half-educated."

The Hebrew Monarchy: a Commentary. By the Rev. Andrew Wood. (Eyre & Spottiswoode.)

THIS book smacks more of the painful learning of the last century than of the slap-dash method of to-day. Being moved to present the bloodstained annals of the Kings of Israel and Judah in a consecutive form, Mr. Wood has culled from the Canonical Books the chief passages bearing on the subject, and has contrived, without altering a word of the Authorised Version or adding any original matter, to weld them into a continuous narrative. To this he has added references to parallel passages, a perfect armoury of critical and explanatory notes, three appendices, and an introduction by the late Dean Payne Smith. The labour which the compilation and preparation for the press of such a book must involve is enormous, and the way it is turned out reflects the highest credit on both author and publisher.

And yet the book is belated. To Mr. Wood one part of Scripture is as good as another, and the chronology of Archbishop Usher is—until B.C. 726, at any rate—the only one possible. He passes over in silence Welhausen's position as to the threefold origin of the Books of Samuel and, the brilliant theories of Renan; and, perhaps, this was to be expected in one who appears to belong to the Evangelical school. But it is more startling to find that he equally ignores the conclusions of his fellow-Churchman, Prof. Sayce, to wit, that the chronology "of the Biblical compiler" from the beginning of Ahab's reign to the invasion of Sennacherib must be rejected, and that no reliance can be placed upon the historical portions of (among others) the Book of Daniel. And although the book may still be useful to the divinity students for whom it is probably intended, for the lay reader the omission reduces it to the level of an attempt to put back the clock.

The Early Church and the Roman Claim. By Prof. J. L. Rentoul. (Melbourne: Melbourne, Mullen & Slade.)

THIS is a series of lectures delivered in a Presbyterian church and written in a controversial style which we had hoped was extinct. The author has no difficulty in disposing to his own satisfaction of the Papal claim to supremacy: but the question to which a great part of the book is devoted is whether the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Melbourne did or did not say that Renan was a Protestant. Judging from the evidence in the book before us, we should say that he did not; and we regret to add that the Protestant advocate's presentation of the opposite view is not marked by good argument, good sense, or good manners.

POETRY.

The Poetry of Sport. Edited by Hedley Peek, "Badminton Library." (Longmans & Co.)

THE editors of the "Badminton Library" have at last seen the conclusion of their task, and in a preface to the volumes in general, Mr. A. E. T. Watson, assistant in the task to the Duke of Beaufort (who also contributes a dedication of the series to the Prince of Wales), justly congratulates himself on the general excellence of the result attained. Unfortunately, this final volume can hardly be regarded as a brilliant conclusion to what has undoubtedly been a successful undertaking. Mr. Peek, who is responsible for the collection, gives evidence of having a more unimpeachable taste in sport than in poetry. Yet we are not prepared to say that his collection may not include all that is worth quoting of the poetry of sport. On the contrary, his chief fault is that he shows more zeal and industry than discretion. He has cast his net wide and indiscriminately. It is true that he insists in his introduction on the necessity of discretion in selecting. But it is difficult to conceive what he can have left out worse than a great part of what he has let in. Yet for the perfect poverty of the volume (apart from this fault of too indiscriminate inclusion) we have no inclination to blame Mr. Peek. We are a sporting nation. We are also a nation of poets, if not a poetical nation. But our poetry of sport is like the snakes in Ireland. We have no poetry of sport. And this book is merely a voluminous proof of that melancholy conclusion. It begins with a series of narrative selections, having direct or indirect reference to sport. Of these, the best are the extracts from Spenser and the old dramatists. They are mostly instances of imagery drawn from sport; with great accuracy of knowledge and great happiness of application. There are, of course, such passages as the description of the hunted hare in Venus and Adonis, of the hunted deer in As You Like It. Then come extracts extending to such things as the History of Manchester; regarding which it can only be said that the passages from Somerville are the best—and bad indeed. They are accurate as to fact; but as to style, they apply Miltonic diction to prosaic subject-matter, with the most turgid results. Then come a large series of selections from songs and lyrics; extending from the seventeenth century downwards. We search in vain for anything which a third-rate poet would not blush to have written. And where editing was required, as in some of the seventeenth century lyrics, Mr. Peek is most guiltless of editing. Thus a racing-song from a comedy of Shirley, the dramatist, which is at any rate curious as preserving the names of famous racers of the day, is printed with all its original errors of orthography and punctuation thick upon it. Here is a specimen stanza:

"Young Constable and Kill deer's famous,
The Cat the Mouse and Noddy Gray,
With nimble Pegabrig you cannot shame us,
With Spaniard nor with Spinola.

Hill climbing white-rose praise doth not
lacke,
Handsome Dunbar, and yellow Jack.
But if I be just all praises must,
Be given to well-breathed Ilian Thrust.

It is evident that here not only are commas left in, defiant of the sense; hyphens omitted, to the confusion of the sense; but that also some names of horses are in capitals, some without capitals, and some half in capitals and half without. Mr. Peek has pointed it just as he found it, making most admired confusion. To correct in detail would be useless: we give the stanza—retaining the old spelling—as it should have been printed:

"Young Constable and Kill-Deeres famous,
The Cat, the Mouse, and Noddy Gray;
With nimble Pegabrig you cannot shame us,
With Spaniard nor with Spinola.
Hill-climbing White-Rose praise doth not
lacke,
Handsome Dunbar, and Yellow Jack.
But if I be just, all praises must
Be given to well-breathed Ilian Thrust."

And so the song is misprinted throughout. Generally, indeed, Mr. Peek seems to have an idea that there must be at least a comma after every line in verse, regardless of the sense. We regret that, with all praise to the really great industry of the editor, we must nevertheless pronounce this a volume sadly destitute of poetic interest, and not too well edited as regards either selection or technical care.

Poems. By Samuel Waddington. (George Bell & Sons.)

MR. WADDINGTON has long borne a name of honour among lovers of poetry for an anthology of his editing. His own verses, also, are familiar to many readers. The little volume before us is the third he has published; and of most of its own contents readers of magazines are already aware; some, indeed, had their first place in our own columns. Light songs are interspersed with epigrams and versicles; and, ranking among the curiosities of sonnet literature, is a poem in that form which boasts an antiquity of nearly seven hundred years. This is "The Foes at Home," which Mr. Waddington translates from the Italian of "Lodovico della Vernaccia." There is a good deal of the influence of Italy, exercised by its people and its places, as well as by its poetry, on the pages of Mr. Waddington. In one sonnet, however, he is as modern as may be, and perhaps Mr. Alfred Austin is nearly as responsible as Mr. Waddington himself for the lines that may as well represent him here:

"KRÜGER.

"Akin to Cromwell, yet averse to strife!
O patriarch of a people doomed to fight
For home and liberty, whose sole delight
Is still in peace to lead a pastoral life
With lithe-limbed children and a loving wife—
Shalt thou not guard and guide thy race aright!
Shalt thou not in thy wisdom and true might Snatch from the brigand's hand the uplifted knife!

"Akin to Cromwell! Hark, methinks I hear
The war of armed battalions drawing near;
Awake, arise! The hour is past for sleep!
Arise and arm thy sons and have no fear!
Arise, Van Tromp! Once more the Dutch shall sweep
The foemen from the veldt as from the deep."

If a poet-laureate is needed for the Transvaal, there is no doubt about Mr. Waddington's fitness of spirit to hold the post.

FICTION.

The Wise and the Wayward. By G. S. Street. (John Lane.)

BRILLIANT in parts, and always written incisively and with continual watchfulness, Mr. Street's novel, his first long story, comes refreshingly to a reviewer who is weary of novelists who write without artistic conscience, and do not sufficiently consider their puppets. Mr. Street has, indeed, given us a distinguished study in ironical tragedy. The theme is a common one—of marriage and disillusion; but one soon perceives the effect of no common handling in the delineation of subtle temperament and the masterly analysis of motive. George Ashton, half scholar and half man about town, is the son of "a subtle-minded fault-finder, a drunkard, and a wayward amorist"; Nelly, his wife, a romantic beauty, and the ill-trained honest daughter of a shady household. They make the great experiment with genuine ideals and something of the glamour of passion. How the passion fades and life becomes bitter to both is set forth at length in Mr. Street's pages. The use of the word tragedy for so common a failure may be justified, because it is from the very fineness of the two natures that it arises. George and Nelly are highly strung people with considerable potentialities, and unwilling to put up with second-bests; spiritual, that is to say, and of the salt of the earth. Therefore they are tangled in the net of their own super-subtlety; a little more of brutal humanity and their disagreements might have ended with a kiss and a blow: the amantium ira clear the air for the normal and the slightly obtuse. It is, you perceive, the tragedy of Mr. Meredith's Modern Love over again. One's sympathy is perhaps most for the woman, who starts at a disadvantage and has the franker impulses. But Mr. Street's world is not all made up of idealists. One may take comfort in the healthy appetites and unqualified success of George's cousins, the Jack Ashtons. Mildred Ashton has all the normal selfish instincts. She cheerfully promotes the perhaps inevitable rupture between her relations, and enjoys her reward in the reversion of George's country house, together with a crown of virtues. She is eminently wise, and you hate her with an undying hatred. Mr. Street's own attitude to his puppets is one of a cynicism which is mainly on the surface. A thorough-going cynic would point out that to be of finer stuff than your fellows is unpractical, and would imply that it doesn't very much matter. To Mr. Street, one fancies, in the case of George and Nelly Ashton, though he prefers to stand a little aloof, it does matter greatly. This is, perhaps, the fair inference from his hostility to Mildred, whom he treats throughout with the same ironical and remorseless courtesy with which Thackeray overwhelmed and made execrable his Becky Sharp. One confesses, however, to a little irritation against Mr. Street's habitual pose of tolerant epicureanism. It covers the fact that he has still some prejudices to slough. He has run the risk of alienating our sympathy from his hero by giving him, lest we should take him for a prig, a rather undue measure of the cruder vices. George Ashton drinks, gambles, and is facilely amorous beyond what seems required.

Mr. Street has his faults; but after all what a blessing it is to come across a fellow who can write. Mr. Street writes easily, with distinction, and with no more mannerism than may pass for good breeding in style. Occasionally, perhaps, he is a little hesitant, elusive, as if perplexed with a subtler shade of meaning than he can quite project into language. But for the most part he wields a fine, swiftly poised phrase, and has the gift of throwing his characters and situations into sharp relief, happily and without tediousness.

The Scholar of Bygate. By Algernon Gissing. (Hutchinson & Co.)

A REALLY first-rate three-volume novel like Mr. Algernon Gissing's Scholar of Bygate comes like a boon and a blessing to the patrons of the circulating library. A tale of sustained interest, excellently written and conceived, fresh in matter, and delightful both for its high romantic spirit and its convincingly human portraiture, this new work of Mr. Algernon Gissing's at once enhances his reputation and reminds us how much after all there is to be said for the three volumes as a literary form. Mr. Gladstone is generally quoted as having declared that there are always three points of view. In a perfect leading article, it is the journalistic tradition, there must be three paragraphs. And, similarly, it was once an "idol," and not an entirely bad one, of fiction that the well-manufactured story fell naturally into three divisions. Mr. Gissing's tale, as a matter of literary workmanship, shows once more, with what seems like real novelty now that we have had a revolt in favour of the single volume, the natural fall of a well-told story into the three divisions. Each of his first two volumes has its proper "curtain": the reader feels that here was the right breathing-place, the right moment for a fresh volume. And this, in a long story, is a legitimate triumph for the writer. But a technical victory is far the least of Mr. Algernon Gissing's merits in the Scholar of Bygate. We can promise its readers a capital story, moving among a set of people every one of whom in his or her own way is interesting and yet uncommon. The title of this novel gives, we think, a misleading impression. Young Crozier, the Tyneside yeoman farmer, who has been called "scholar" by contrast rather than from any real academic acquirements, is the centre of a society that reminds us by turns of Mr. Baring-Gould and Mr. Thomas Hardy, the best of both; and in Lina Brett we seem to recognise a feminine type which Mr. Hardy, always attempting, has never quite succeeded in incarnating so justly. Mr. Gissing is inclined to be tender to woman's weaknesses where Mr. Hardy would be cruel; and, on the whole, this consideration, part of that "treatment" which in a novelist is "the man," makes for what is nobler in the pleasures of literature. Jenniper Curle, the second of the two chief women-actors in the story, is a fine character, finely drawn. There is a touch of dramatic genius in Mr. Gissing's description of Jenniper standing with her feet in the damp footprints left by Sibbald Crozier, as the man she loves leaves her to make a great innocent fool of himself with Lina Brett. Old Crozier, too, is a genuine character, strongly and convincingly realised for us by the author; while the conception of the super-subtilised Brett, half lunatic, half swindler, and always plausible except to such a stern judge as the straightforward old yeoman, has the advantage of being thoroughly "modern," and also an admirable foil for the simpler and more rustic elements in the story. Altogether this is a novel which should have a great success. It has a happy ending, which comes naturally and rightly, and there is nothing either mawkish or morbid throughout.

Sister Jane. By Joel Chandler Harris (Constable & Co.)

MR. JOEL CHANDLER HARRIS, famous as the creator of Brer Rabbit, has one of the pleasantest methods of spinning a yarn that we know. It is impossible not to be attracted by everything that "Uncle Remus" writes. His story-telling wraps you round like Sancho Panza's comfortable cloak of sleep. His humour is essentially comfortable, and invariably kind. And of all Mr. Harris's recent stories Sister Jane is the best. It has a good plot, and we drop at once into familiarity with the quiet and unpretending middle-class provincial Americans whose eventful history is related. The least thing would be a sensation in the life of Jane Wornum, who did her duty in that state of life to which it had pleased an American Providence to call her; or of Mrs. Beshears, her friend, and Miss Polly and Miss Becky, the two old spinsters; while William, Jane's brother, who imagines himself old before forty, is placid enough to divide male honours with Tommy Tinkins, the cat, a not much less important member of Sister Jane's household. Into this uninspiring and slumbering circle come two disturbing elements in the shape of an illicit and an uncomprehended love, and very pleasantly is the career of these two intruders narrated. The narrator is William Wornum, who makes up for his rather exaggerated old-maidishness by a maternal affection for all his surroundings, which is represented as due to his attainments as a philosopher. At any rate, he is a kind-hearted creature, and we are all glad in knowing perfectly well all the time that sweet Mary Bullard is only waiting for him to open his eyes and find out that she loves him, which duly occurs when the other complications have advanced sufficiently for the tale to come to an end. The case of Mandy Satterlee and her baby (called anything from Klips to Keezes) is altogether more explosive than this, and upon it depend all the active elements in the story. Sister Jane herself is a type of managing woman whom American literature has made fairly familiar, and a very lovable figure she is, with her strong will and her sharp tongue and her good heart. The book contains a good many other effective sketches of character. The revivalist preacher, "Jimmy Danielly," the eccentric "Jincy," and the two old men, "Grandsir Roach" and "Uncle Jimmy Cosby," are cleverly drawn. Indeed, this is one of the best pieces of literature sent us lately from the United States.

The Impudent Comedian, and Others. By F. Frankfort Moore. With Illustrations by Robert Sauber. (Pearson.)

THE five stories comprised in this volume deal with seventeenth and eighteenth century personages—with Nell Gwynne, the Marlboroughs, Johnson, Garrick, Mrs. Siddons, and many others. It is, perhaps, a little bold to submit personages so well known, and the traditional incidents of their lives, to the mercy of a modern story-teller's imagination; but Mr. Moore has, at any rate, succeeded in producing a readable volume of tales. Personally, we prefer Boswell's memories of Johnson's talk to Mr. Moore's imitation of the same, but we do not forget that there is a considerable public which, probably, will be of another way of thinking. The best story in the collection tells of Mrs. Siddons in Dublin, and of the artistic fashion in which that dragon of virtue and paragon of housewives turned the tables upon certain impertinent undergraduates who had subjected her to the grotesque importunities of the vain, half-witted Dionysius Hogan. Mr. Sauber's illustrations are interesting, and his perspective is full of surprises.

In Oor Kailyard. By W. G. Tarnet. (Simpkin, Marshall.)

THERE is a frankness about Mr. Tarnet's choice of a title which would disarm the most virulent decrifier of the school to which he belongs. The contents are just the linked series of village tales that you would expect; and if your standard be not set at the highest level of such work, you are likely to find, when you come to read them, your expectation bettered. For our part we like them "fine"—in degrees, of course, and with exceptions: particularly we except a Saxon importation, Johanna by name, a damsel who talks like a tract on the vice of drunkenness, and for "you" says "zoo." Even in the stories wherein she plays a part, however, you have touches that show an excellent faculty of observation and a very human sympathy. There is humour, too, of the pawky kind. Not the most perverse of Southron reviewers could altogether resist the appeal in "A Laggard in Love," when Eggy sits between his father- and mother-in-law-elect, dissipating in unexpected gifts to them the treasures of his kailyard, if by any means he may learn something of the whereabouts of his dear. Such as still have their thirst for this kind of thing unslaked will find Mr. Tarbet's bin perfectly genuine and wholesome.

The Rudeness of the Honourable Mr. Leatherhead. By Gordon Seymour. (J. M. Dent & Co.)

MR. GORDON SEYMOUR has "only become conscious of the originality of these stories through the letter of a kindly critic." In a preface of twenty-six pages he discusses the question in what this originality consists. He discovers that his stories

"deal heavily and seriously with things that are not weighty . . . ; that they attempt laboriously to dig and delve down into the innermost depths of—the surface; and in that form they move in the . . . borderland that lies between . . . the essay and the story."

The story of The Rudeness of the Hon. Mr. Leatherhead "digs and delves" into an incidental act of discourtesy to an old lady, which, by manifesting him a bounder, is indirectly the ruin of Mr. Leatherhead's diplomatic career. If Mr. Seymour could contrive to take himself a trifle less seriously, if he would recognise that the careful observation of trifling external impressions is not a new idea, and that even the "heaviness," the "seriousness," and the superficiality upon which he quaintly prides himself hardly constitute a title to originality—if, further, he will be content to clasp an occasional martingale upon his puppets when they show an inclination to overpass the line which divides the essay from the story, instead of pitting them on the back for the same—we shall look forward to a notable improvement in his future work. For he really can observe.

Hans Van Donder: a Romance of Boer Life. By Charles Montague. (Constable & Co.)

A STORY in which the pastoral simplicity of Boer life is pictured, and the sterling character of the Dutchman of the Transvaal is exemplified together with its rather pathetic simplicity. Van Donder tells to the stranger the history of his life, which is interwoven with that of a monstrous elephant tusk that adorns his house. It is the story of a born "beast Boer," of one to whom the breaking-in of wild horses and the hunting of rogue elephants are the incidents of daily life. He tells of his wooing, and of his desperate effort to say the fateful words before the last flicker of the candle which measured his opportunity; of the tragic death of the damsel's father, while he was forced to stand helplessly by; of pastoral loves and jealousies, and of homely happiness. The story keeps well upon the surface; and if at times the dangers are crowded incredibly thick, and the narrative style becomes rather turgid, yet, on the whole, we can commend it for its healthy tone and for the sympathetic treatment of a people who are not for the moment the idols of the music-hall.

FROM CROWDED SHELVES.

Oceanic Ichthyology. By G. B. Goode and T. H. Bean. (Special Bulletin of the Smithsonian Institution.)

WE regret to say that this vast work, giving a "compendium and summary of existing knowledge in regard to Oceanic Ichthyology," is not a really satisfactory production. The authors speak of it with misgiving, and frankly confess they are disappointed in their labours.

The study of the fishes living at great depths began with the Challenger Expedition. The wonderful results then achieved were soon followed up by investigations conducted by other governments, especially the United States. The collections thus made by the Blake and other American ships are the material to which this treatise primarily relates. Most of the descriptions have already appeared in various publications, and the preface states that the whole work was made ready for press in 1885. Owing to various delays, and especially to the successive appearance of the Reports of the Challenger and other European expeditions, it has had to be three times re-written. The plan was gradually extended, so that the work, instead of being confined to the fishes of the American expeditions, now gives notices of all oceanic fishes of the world. The result is an unwieldy patchwork of by no means uniform value, showing traces of its unconformable growth. The heading "Deep Sea Fishes of the Atlantic Basin" still stands on each page, though the matter may not relate either to the Atlantic or the deep sea fauna. In view, however, of the great labour expended, and the apologies of the authors, criticism is disarmed. Zoologists, besides, who know how much careful work has been done by Dr. Goode and Dr. Bean in describing the collections made by the American surveying ships, need not be told that the records are thorough and the work of considerable importance. It was, perhaps, scarcely desirable to extend the original scope. The incorporation of abstracts and copies of figures from other memoirs does not greatly increase the value of the book, for only the working specialist will use them, and he must of necessity refer to originals. No account is yet given of the conclusions which, from their wide studies in this exceptionally interesting field, the authors are well qualified to draw, but Dr. Goode promises a further work dealing with the more general aspects of the subject.

As in most of the official scientific publications of the United States, the illustrations are miserably poor, offering a depressing contrast to the superb pictures of deep-sea fishes issued by the Challenger, by the French and Norwegian Governments, and lately by the Prince of Monaco. Naturalists will rejoice when Americans recognise that figures made by cheap mechanical processes are inadequate and unworthy representations of the treasures of the Smithsonian Institution. The material demands first-rate plates, and if they cannot be made in America they should be got from Europe, though the national pride be hurt thereby. In this, of course, the authors are blameless.

The Preaching of Islam. By T. W. Arnold. (Constable & Co.)

BORN in its conception and in its treatment this may justly be called an original book. It undertakes to tell the story of the propagation of the Muslim faith, as the result not of military conquest and political organisation, but of continuous missionary effort. The author is professor at the Anglo-Oriental college at Aligarh, founded by that remarkable man Sayyid Ahmad Khan, which has already done so much to raise the status of the Muhammadan population in Northern India. His experience there has evidently produced on his mind a similar result to that caused in Colenso by his Zulu pupils. He went out to teach European philosophy; he has learnt that the East is everywhere effervescing with religious enthusiasm, still believes its ancient creeds, and daily realises thought in conduct and in action. What effect this may have had upon his own beliefs he nowhere directly tells us. We are left to infer it from the sympathetic attitude he adopts towards the religion of Muhammad. At the present time, when Turkey and Morocco are acknowledged to be two of the rotten powers of the world, it is well to have our attention called to the debt which humanity owes to Islam in the past, and to the good work which it is yet doing in raising the lower races from the depths of pure paganism. Mr. E. W. Blyden, himself a Christian and a negro, has declared that Muhammadanism is a more effective agency for civilisation in Western Africa than Christianity. Prof. Arnold, taking a wider field both in time and space, asserts that the hold which Islam has gained over the half of two continents is due, not to the sword, but to its own spiritual attractions and the devotion of individual proselytes. We are not concerned to deny that he may have underestimated the extent of persecution at various times; for it is idle to suppose that persecution can never be an effective method of conversion. But we believe that his historical retrospect is essentially correct. Particularly interesting are the facts he has collected about the spread of Islam in the Malay Archipelago, and the modern missionary movement in India. Prof. Arnold has written a book of good faith, which may be commended alike for its historical research, its severe impartiality, and its easy style. The list of authorities at the end adds not a little to its permanent value.

A Record of the Buddhist Religion, as practised in India and the Malay Archipelago, A.D. 671-695. By I-Tsing. Translated by J. Takakusu. (Oxford: Clarendon Press.)

WE have here published, for the first time, the account of his visit to India of a third Chinese pilgrim, some fifty years later than the greatest of them, Hiuen-Tsang, and nearly two centuries later than Fa-Hien. It must be admitted that his story is the least interesting of the three in respect of historical and geographical information; but, in the entire absence of authentic Indian annals, every scrap of contemporary evidence from outside becomes valuable. As Prof. Max Müller points out in an introductory letter, the references of I-Tsing to the Indian books he studied enable us to fix with certainty the date of a series of grammarians associated with the Renaissance of Sanskrit literature. The uncertainty of Indian chronology is shown by the fact that one of these grammarians has hitherto been assigned by European scholars to as late a period as the twelfth century. I-Tsing's work is also useful for its full description of the ceremonies and customs practised by the Buddhist monks in India at his time. About the "heretics," or non-Buddhists, we learn less, though the following passage deserves quotation:

"The Brahmins are regarded throughout the five parts of India as the most honourable (caste). They do not, when they meet in a place, associate with the other three castes, and the mixed classes of the people have still less intercourse with them. The scriptures they revere are the four Vedas, containing about 100,000 verses. The Vedas have been handed down from mouth to mouth, not transcribed on paper or leaves. In every generation there exist some intelligent Brahmins who can recite the 100,000 verses."

This is a fair example of the matter-of-fact information which it pleased the Chinese pilgrim to ascertain and record. It remains to give credit to Mr. Takakusu for the scholarly manner in which he has accomplished a very difficult task. He is, we understand, a young Japanese, who has been trained in Germany as well as in England; and it is to be hoped that he will be encouraged in the work of publication begun by Max Müller's former students, the late Bunyū Nanjio and Kasawara.

A Short History of Aryan Medical Science.
By Sir Bhagvat Singh Jee, Thakore Saheb of Gondal. (Macmillan & Co.)

THE Thakore Saheb of Gondal is, we believe, the only ruling prince in India who has graduated in a British university. He won the degree of M.D. at Edinburgh, and he also passed the examinations of the Edinburgh College of Physicians. He has now joined the ranks of royal and titled authors, by a work of real utility, making known to Western students the traditional system of Indian medicine, as it presents itself to a sympathetic and well-qualified observer. We would not be understood as accepting all that is here written, either as statement of fact or as reasonable. It would, indeed, be very easy to collect from this book a number of passages pour rire, of a sort to strengthen the English practitioner in his contempt for native empiricism. But this would be to make a poor return for the labour which the author has expended in examining the medical treatises of his countrymen, and for the general toleration of his views. He seems to us to have made out some at least of his main contentions: that the healing art is of immemorial antiquity in India, and lent to the Greeks and Arabs more than it borrowed from them; that the early Indian doctors possessed a reasonable diagnosis of disease, and also considerable skill and boldness in surgical operations; that much may be said in favour of the ceremonial regimen they prescribe for all the details of daily life and conduct; and, finally, that the *kabiraj*s or village quacks probably know of many simples that would enrich the Pharmacopœia. In brief, Indian medicine might compare favourably with that of England in the days of Shakespeare. But to concede so much is a very different thing from placing it on an equality with the modern art, as based upon physiological and pathological science. Historically, it is of much interest, as exhibiting the independent growth of generations of highly cultivated minds. But it never emerged from the empirical stage, and was overlaid from time to time with a congeries of absurd nostrums, which it would be hard to parallel outside Gil Blas. For us, its teachings are at least as much those of warning as of example.

Records and Record Searching. By Walter Rye. (George Allen.)

To the historian, the topographer, the writer of lives, and the maker of pedigrees, Mr. Rye's compilation is familiar and invaluable. It is in itself a handbook to the British Museum, the Record Office, the Herald's College, the Probate Office, and the District Registries. It instructs in how to put together a genealogy and to write the history of a parish. It is a bibliography of Chronicles, State papers, and similar publications. It explains, describes, and classifies the innumerable and puzzling documents through which the young researcher—"let loose on the enormous mass of the Records in Fetter-lane and Bloomsbury, has to grope his way." Pipe Rolls, Pedes Finium, De Banco Rolls, Inquisitiones Post Mortem, Doggett Rolls, Chartularies, Pell Records, all the fascinating débris of law courts, land tenures, and Exchequer proceedings are here briefly expounded, and their value as sources of historical information estimated. The author is himself an antiquarian of wide experience, and writes out of the fulness of his personal knowledge. The first edition has now been published some years, and this is a second, revised and brought up to date with the greatest care. Many additions have been made, especially to the index, into which a number of references on points not dealt with in the text have been incorporated. The wise man will buy this book, and will use it wisely—that is to say, he will have it interleaved and will keep it up to date himself until a third edition appears. Why does not Mr. Allen issue some interleaved copies?

The Art Schools of London. (Swan Sonnenschein.)

THERE are handbooks to most things nowadays, a fact of which we are reminded by receiving a copy of Miss Tessa Mackenzie's The Art Schools of London, now issued in its second year. The scope of the book has already been widened, music schools and dramatic being now for the first time catalogued and described. The book must be very useful to those for whom it is intended, and it is pleasant to find how big a world, after all, is that which is peopled by the art students of London when they are all told.

Curiosities of the Key-Board and the Staff.
By Alfred Rhodes. (Augener & Co.)

"LIKE all other books on harmony, the present work requires time to be understood," says the author. Of course, everything takes time. But the question is, How much? Many of the curiosities displayed by the "reflective principle" may be quickly perceived, and will, no doubt, be of great help both to students and teachers. The diagram, giving the inner and usual circle of keys, and the outer one "from which composers gather double-sharp or double-flat notation," has rather a formidable appearance, and yet it may be easily mastered. Mr. Rhodes is quite right: composers touched upon those keys, and they should therefore be familiar to students. Our author, had he been so minded, might have added to his curiosities, and given many an example from the great masters, showing that they often wrote as if ignorant of that outer circle. When Mr. Rhodes applies the "reflective principle," on which his book is founded, to questions of harmony, then the process of examination becomes much slower. We are surprised not to find any mention of the theory of harmony based not only on an upper, but on an under series of harmonics, as advocated by Dr. H. Riemann and others. In that system, the minor common chord is shown as a "reflection" of the major common chord. The chapters on "Chromatic Notation" and on the "Diminished Seventh" give a good idea of our author's method of applying his system; they are decidedly interesting, though not altogether convincing. The whole work is, however, well worth reading.

The Essays of Elia. By Charles Lamb.
In 2 vols. Gulliver's Travels. By Jonathan Swift. Religio Medici. By Sir Thomas Browne. (J. M. Dent & Co.)

THE "Temple Classics," of which these are four new volumes, leave very little to be desired by the purchaser: they are light; they have flexible covers; their page measures six inches by four, which is almost the perfect size for the pocket; they are slender; and, what is perhaps their chiefest recommendation, they have no introduction. We are growing so tired of the modern pigmy presuming to patronise the ancient giant that this absence of a preface is true relief. To what extent the Religio Medici was needed, and, having been issued, will be read, we cannot pretend to say; but there are always good intellects to give a warm welcome to Elia in pocket guise. Swift's terrible satire has probably never been so prettily and winningly presented!

Debrett's House of Commons and the Judicial Bench. (Dean & Son.)

EVERY year the new Parliamentary Debrett comes opportunely against the time the House meets. This year it is, as usual, packed with information and, furthermore, garnished with eight hundred armorial bearings. These should prove a mine of wealth to "X" of the Saturday Review, that keen-eyed herald, and to the humorist who is assisting Mr. Reed in devising satirical coats of arms for Punch.

ACADEMY PORTRAITS.

XIV.—CHARLES LAMB.

LAMB, spider-like, spun his webs from himself. No other writer is so exclusively personal. He knew that in himself as himself lay his strength, and was wise enough to avoid dissociation. He failed only when he attempted the dramatic, as in "Rosamund Gray" and "Mr. H."; or when the idea was another's, as in the insincere verses for children which he wrote to help his sister. That no man has ever better judged his own work we know from the infrequency of his failures, and from that illuminating anecdote which tells how, when his farce "Mr. H." was disastrously produced, this delightful creature joined in the hissing. In time he learned thoroughly his powers and his limitations; he saw that his true medium was prose, and his true vocation criticism and commentary. All his right work comes under these groups: he was not constructive, but elaborative; he could carry another man's thought a little farther; he could turn for our inspection new and unsuspected facets of an old gem; he could embroider more whimsically and wittily than any man save Shakespeare's self. Lamb had two prose manners, the consciously elaborate and the familiar, but it would be hard to say that one was less his natural self than the other. The Lamb of the essays, in spite of their carefully arranged sentences and quaint, gay artificialities and archaisms, is no different from the Lamb of the letters, which must generally have been written with a running pen. Few writers can have been so conscious students of their art. He wrote verse like a scholar and a gentleman, and, although not a great poet, no poem in the world goes more directly to the heart than "The Old Familiar Faces."

One of Lamb's best lies (and no one has lied more winningly) tells how he called on Coleridge early one morning and passed into the garden with him; and how Coleridge, seizing Lamb by a button of his coat, embarked upon one of his rambling philosophical dissertations. At the East India House Lamb's office stool was awaiting its tardy master, so, perceiving no other way to liberty, he deftly divided the button from the coat with his penknife, and hurried off. In the evening (so his mischievous story ran) he looked in on Coleridge on the way back and found him still standing in the garden with the button between his fingers, still holding forth upon the higher life. Lamb also holds us by the button: but there is this difference, that we never wish to use the knife. With no writer are we more intimate, more at home. He endows us with the freedom of himself: we are his honoured citizens. The little things that we know about him are just those things that make for fellowship—we know that his life was often bitter; we know that he was humanly frail; we know that he twisted the language into bad puns (by which we mean good puns) and laughed at them himself; and knowing these federating facts, how can there be a rift between us? Hence Lamb is better loved than any English writer except, perhaps, Goldsmith.

The accompanying portrait of Lamb in fancy dress was painted by Hazlitt, when he was still thinking of painting as a profession, in 1805. Lamb was then thirty, and, it is more than probable, not in the least like this picture. Its special interest lies in the representation of the most Elizabethan of modern writers in Elizabethan garb.

CHILD-STUDY IN AMERICA.

THE PEDAGOGUE IN THE MAKING.

A LITTLE book which has reached us from Boston, containing upwards of a thousand authenticated proofs that children are imitative, is sufficient testimony that in America, or at least at Worcester, Mass., where this work originated, they have taken child-study very badly. In this country we are content to leave it to a few distinguished inquirers. Until the present time, at any rate, our young men and maidens have shown no disposition to prefer child-study to cycling and kindred amusements. At the State Normal School at Worcester, Mass., by whose scholars these records were collected, a less frivolous condition of mind prevails, and child-study is pursued breathlessly and strenuously by young and old. Heavy of heart indeed is that Normal scholar who returns from a walk down town without bagging some observation worthy of print. And if the Normal scholars are like this, why, what must the abnormal ones be?

The book (to come to particulars) is the first volume of Heath's Pedagogical Library, which is in itself a sufficiently imposing style; its full title is Child Observations. First Series: Imitation and Allied Activities, and it is edited by Miss Ellen M. Haskell (who has written on child study in the Pedagogical Seminary), and it has an introduction by E. H. Russell, Principal of the Normal School. It is dedicated to Grenville

Stanley Hall, LL.D., "the pioneer and chief promoter of child-study in the United States," to whose suggestion the simple method since pursued in the Normal School owes its origin; and the aim of the book is to bring the teachers of America into closer and more sympathetic relations with children as individuals. So far the object of the work is meritorious. Nothing is more desirable than that the relations of teacher and child should be sympathetic; but exactly how the first volume of the Pedagogical (sweet, sympathetic word—Pedagogical!) Library will help, we cannot see; for a young man or woman who does not know at the outset that children are by nature imitative is making a mistake in ever thinking to become a teacher. The book is a monument of the unnecessary; never was the death of Queen Anne so insisted upon; never were paper and printer's ink so superfluously expended. It is one tremendous chestnut. There is nothing in these 250 pages that Eve did not know. It will not, in the idiom of Worcester, Mass., help teachers any; no, not if they sit up learning it, nights. And it has not even the merit of being funny, for out of the 1,208 imitative actions recorded 1,200 are commonplace in themselves and commonplace in their descriptions; all having been reduced to one dead level of reporteresse. It is like spending a week with the enthusiastic young mother of a dull family. And yet Principal Russell in his introduction speaks of the "irresistible attractiveness there is in these little narratives!"

The world is so poor in things that have irresistible attractiveness that we must quote some of these plums, collected by the scholars of the Normal School, in the hope that among our readers are some who are as easily attracted as Principal Russell. The observations are divided into groups, the first dealing with children between the ages of one and three. In every case, where possible, the child's name and age are given; but sometimes the hero of the record is described as unknown. The initial entry gives the keynote of the book: "(1) Gertrude. Age, one year. Gertrude's sister hurt her hand, and ran to her mother to have it kissed. Gertrude saw her, and, holding her hand with the other as if it were hurt, extended it to her mother to be kissed." For a moment one does not know whether one ought to admire Gertrude. This is the kind of thing which, when fond mothers tell, leads to the reluctant smile; perhaps the chief merit of the book before us is that it does not similarly demand appreciation at the point of the bayonet, so to speak. "(37) Henry. Age, one year seven months. I hid a pencil that Henry wanted; and when he could not find it he said, 'All gone!' swaying his right hand from left to right very gracefully." Clever fellow, Henry! "(39) Mary. Age, one year eight months. Mary asks for a toothpick after a meal and uses it very intelligently." We like Herbert much better: "(41) Herbert. Age, one year eight months. I was taking care of Herbert one afternoon, and left him alone on the back piazza for about ten minutes, when I came back he had been in the back room, and, finding the refrigerator door open, had taken a pound lump of butter and was rubbing it on some clothes soaking in a tub." Helen had a sense of justice, or, at least, of balance: "(48) Helen. Age, one year nine months. Helen was reluctant to have her face washed, and struggled so long that my patience nearly gave out, and I sat her down rather hard in my lap. A few minutes later she got a sponge and towel, and vigorously washed the cat's face. Before she stopped she set the cat down hard on the floor, and said 'Nare!'" "(112) Gertie. Age, two years three months. I observed that when Gertie used a lead pencil she put the point in her mouth to wet it."

We take others at random from the later groups. "(327) Harry. Age, four years. Harry carried his chair on his back, and said 'I'm a coal man.'" A few pages farther on this important record is repeated. "(366) Unknown. Age, about four years. A little boy, holding a banana in his hand, pointed it at another boy, and made believe to shoot him." "(367) Unknown. I saw a small boy walking lame. He had his left hand on his hip, and used a stick in his right hand. He was not lame." "(441) Richard. Age, four years eight months. When Richard was given his scissors in the children's class he held them up to his eye and said 'Bang!'" "(502) Unknown. Age, about five years. I saw two boys with moustaches made of white cotton. They did not stick on very well." "(751) Several children. Age, about seven years. I heard one of these children say, 'If I can't be husband I won't play.' I afterwards asked one of them what they were playing. She said they were playing 'Noah,' and the child I heard speaking always wanted to be Noah, and never was willing to be an elephant. She also said a rainy day was the nicest time to play 'Noah.'" "(1011) Unknown. Age, about ten years. I saw two boys each with a roll of paper in his mouth about the size of a cigarette. The boys were puffing and spitting." But enough of irresistible attractiveness! The best thing in the book is the long account at the end of the games which a certain family used to play. The games were not better than those of other families, but the adopted names were. One of the boys was Valentine Dandelion Letterlover Inkstand, and one of the girls, Bevamoy Tredennis Macurnis Pumpet. She was called Bill for short. Pumpet is good. The book, unlike many of superior worth, has a full index. If anyone should want it, it is published in England by Isbister & Co.

From the words of Principal Russell we gather that child-study will continue rampant in America:

"The field of child study," he writes, "is a very broad one, and may be profitably entered upon by many workers with different equipment and divers objects of pursuit. There is room for all [alas, poor studied children!], and all may act in harmony and with mutual helpfulness."

To the students embarking on this pastime we would remark, in the words of a sage, there are limits to the profitable elaboration of the obvious.

NOTES AND NEWS.

THE withdrawal of Mr. Carew Hazlitt's Four Generations of a Literary Family, reviewed in another column, is the literary sensation of the week. To the ordinary non-publisher mind it is amazing that a huge, expensive work such as this, sold at 31s. 6d. and largely advertised, should ever have been issued at all if it is to be recalled at once. Surely the MS. was read. Mr. Redway has, however, decided to withdraw the book from circulation. But whether the libraries will also refuse to circulate it is another matter; and of one thing I am certain, and that is, that the booksellers will prefer selling their copies to returning them, and selling them at an advanced price too.

I HAVE no doubt whatever that Messrs. Constable will, in the long run, do very well out of Nansen's book, but just now they must be a little out of love with the explorer, his name, his writing, and everything about him. Never was a firm so dogged by annoyance. They began by paying a record price; they then had the Chronicle affair; they have had the utmost difficulty in acquiring Dr. Nansen's copy and getting it translated; they have had to postpone the date of the publication; and then, through the excessive zeal of one of their own travellers, an advance trade copy of the book was given to the Scotsman, and reviewed in that paper several days before the time was ripe. But now I trust all is at last serene.

MR. OSBORNE JAY's letter to the Fortnightly, in reply to Mr. Traill's criticism of Mr. Morrison's Child of the Jago, should settle for ever the point whether or not Mr. Morrison is a superficial generaliser on insufficient bases, or a trustworthy observer. "I have one thing to say," says Mr. Jay, "and that is, that Mr. Morrison's book exhibits with perfect truth the life of my parish as I have known it day by day for ten years."

A LETTER from America, having reference to dedications which Mr. Stevenson wrote in the copies of his books which he gave to Dr. Trudeau, informs me that collectors of Stevensoniana who thought ever to become possessed of the originals may as well forget that ambition, for Dr. Trudeau's house, and all in it, was long ago destroyed by fire. These dedications were published in the ACADEMY of December 26. Their original publication in the American Book Buyer was due to the good taste of the binder who bound Dr. Trudeau's books. Had he not for his own pleasure made a copy of the dedications they would have been lost with everything else in the fire.

STUDENTS of the art of hymn-writing will find material of interest in the little collection of a dozen hymns which has been prepared for use in 1897, in commemoration of what is loosely called the "Diamond Jubilee" of Queen Victoria. Messrs. Skeffington are the publishers, and the authors are the Bishop of Ripon, Canon Twells, Canon Rawnsley, the Rev. S. J. Stone, Mr. Chatterton Dix, Mr. Godfrey Thring, and Mr. Jackson Mason. The collection begins with the National Anthem, the following additional or alternative stanza having been supplied by Mr. M. S. Skeffington:

"Thou Who for threescore years
In sunshine, cloud, and tears
Hast kept our Queen:
Still be her Guide and Stay,
Thro' life's uncertain way
Till dawns the perfect day:
God bless our Queen."

MR. WILLIAM WATSON, it may be remembered, adventured upon a revised national anthem; but no use has been made of it here. None of these hymns equals the glorious "Battle Hymn of the Republic" by Julia Ward Howe—"Mine eyes have seen the glory of the coming of the Lord"—but considering the difficulties under which the authors had to labour, some of the results are fair.

I READ through Mr. Stephen Crane's The Little Regiment at a sitting on the evening of the day it was published—last Monday. Whether or not this group of battle stories is an advance upon The Red Badge of Courage I leave to your appointed critic; but the book moves me irresistibly to say a hurried word upon the latest performance of this young man of twenty-five. To picture the battles of half a century ago—their fury and their fire—with such fidelity that the business is as vivid as the street life of to-day would seem to be as easy to the young giant as—well, as paragraph writing. And yet it is not so much his imagination as his control of that imagination that sets me hero-worshipping.

MR. CRANE's style stalks straight on. It does not amble to the right, neither does it nuzzle to the left. Its movement is like the slow, solemn, serious strength of the engine of some ocean-going steamer. The words bite into the page. Long after the book is closed and put away, his soldiers, swarthy and stained, clatter through the mind haloed by the misty glory of battle. Miss Corelli has imagination—nobody denies that—but her imagination is like water that gushes up and floods the street from a broken main. Mr. Crane's drives along its controlled channel in ample, strenuous servitude. It is said that he has undertaken to supply war correspondence for an American paper. Will he, I wonder, be able to describe things seen as admirably as he can visualise things imagined?

THE circulation of English magazines in America has led to at least one complication. The serial rights of Robert Louis Stevenson's romance "St. Ives" were sold separately for America and for England; but, apparently, not exclusively for either country. McClure's Magazine bought them for America, and the Pall Mall Magazine for England. The Pall Mall, however, has also some twenty thousand readers on the other side of the Atlantic, a fact which the proprietor of McClure's Magazine did not anticipate, and does not relish. A discussion is now in progress between these two parties. McClure's Magazine cannot, however, be suffering very badly, as circulations go in America: a rival which sells but a poor twenty thousand copies can be nothing to it! Another victim is Mr. Scribner, who bought the book rights of St. Ives, and fears that he may find that all interest in the story has evaporated before the time of publication.

To the list of English magazines with American editions which I gave last week must be added The Studio, which is henceforward to be issued across the Atlantic with a new cover designed by Mr. Will H. Bradley (who seems indispensable to American publishers with modern ideas), and the title The International Studio. Mr. John Lane will publish it from his New York Bodley Head. In thus being published from a Head The International Studio falls into line with Pallas Athene and the great Pantagruel.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK found a hundred books not too many in which to gather the world's best literature. Mr. Charles Dudley Warner proposes, in the language of sport, to give him seventy and beat him. In thirty volumes Mr. Warner undertakes, with assistance, to give a sufficient idea of the scope and character of the best writing extant. As the advertisement states, these volumes will "represent all the literature of all time, from the stone records of Assyria and Egypt down to the writings of Kipling, Stevenson, Weyman, Howells, and Octave Thanet." It is, indeed, a catholic enterprise. Elsewhere we are told that "the great poems of the world are here, and the great imaginary tales; but the great pages of historical, scientific, and philosophical narrative and exposition are here too. Gibbon and Darwin and Bacon are no more overlooked than Shakespeare and Thackeray." Splendid!

THE causes of this tremendous project are threefold: namely, that there are too many books, that selection is too difficult to the ordinary reader, and that Americans have very little time. Hence Mr. Warner's thirty-volume Bovrilisation, as one might call it. "The world," says the preliminary announcement gaily, "is not really suffering at this time for a new Homer, a new Shakespeare, or a new Sir Walter Scott; but it is suffering greatly for some time and money-saving literary convenience which will enable it to profit by the creations of the Homers and Shakespeares and Sir Walters and all the others whom it already has."

THE fact that Beau Austin, played to perfection as it was at the Paymarket in 1890, had not a long run was regrettable enough at the time. It seems even more bitter to day, at a season of such dramatic aridity as we are suffering from, as one turns over the leaves of the pocket edition of the play which Mr. Heinemann has just published. During the thirteen years since Messrs. Henley and Stevenson's fastidious comedy was finished, the English stage has been enriched by but one costume play of equal distinction, and that also short-lived—Mr. Henry James's Guy Domville.

THE very fact that Beau Austin is so good to read is probably proof enough of its unfitness for representation in any but a subsidised theatre. It is extremely good to read. Although familiar to many, I must quote the concluding lines of the prologue, one of the last prologues, I suppose, that has been written, since the old handsome habit has fallen now into complete desuetude:

"Dead—dead and done with! Swift from shine to shade
The roaring generations flit and fade.
To this one, fading, flitting, like the rest,
We come to proffer—be it worst or best—
A sketch, a shadow, of one brave old time;
A hint of what it might have held sublime;
A dream, an idyll, call it what you will,
Of man still Man, and woman—Woman still!"

THE race is not always to the swift, nor the battle to the strong, nor the large cheque to the best author. So I deduce from the announcement that Mr. Wilson Barrett received £1,000—one thousand pounds!—besides a certain proportion of royalties, for his romance, The Sign of the Cross. I hear, moreover, the sale has been so large that Mr. John Macqueen has no reason to regret the bargain he made.

THE ONLOOKER.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

MR. MEREDITH's essay on Comedy, which, as already announced, is to be issued in book form by Messrs. Constable, will be seen next week. The essay originally appeared in the short-lived New Quarterly Magazine in 1877, and has never been reprinted.

Sister Jane, noticed in another column, the new book by "Uncle Remus," which Messrs. Constable published a few weeks ago, is nearly out of print. A new edition is expected to be ready shortly.

THE new novel entitled A Writer of Fiction, by Clive Holland, author of My Japanese Wife, will be published by Messrs. Constable on the 15th.

A NEW edition of Mr. Spenser Wilkinson's The Nation's Awakening is in preparation by Messrs. Constable, and the same firm will shortly re-issue Sir Charles Dilke's and Mr. Spenser Wilkinson's joint work on Imperial Defence.

MR. E. A. BENNETT has written a novel entitled A Man from the North. Mr. John Lane will issue it both in England and America.

MR. GEORGE REDWAY is about to add to his list of books for sportsmen and naturalists: a work on travel and big game by Mr. Percy Selous and Mr. H. A. Bryden, with illustrations by Mr. Charles Whympere.

MR. MURRAY issues this week the first volume of The Dawn of Modern Geography, by Mr. Raymond C. Beazley. In this volume the author surveys his subject down to the end of the reign of Henry VII. The great Arabian, Chinese, and Mohammedan travellers of the centuries previous to this date will receive from Mr. Beazley the attention they have hitherto somewhat lacked.

A NEW and revised edition of Mr. Baring-Gould's Lives of the Saints, with additional biographies of Cornish and Welsh saints and several English martyrs, will be issued shortly by Mr. Nimmo, in monthly parts—a form in which it is likely to attract many new readers. A Saints' Calendar for every day in the year will be one of the new features.

MR. HEINEMANN's idea of a series of books on the Literature of the World is about to be given its practical shape. The first volume, which is on ancient Greek literature, and is written by Prof. G. A. Gilbert Murray, will be seen almost immediately.

MR. HEINEMANN will also publish The Outgoing Turk; or, Impressions of a Journey through the Western Balkans, by Mr. H. C. Thomson, author of The Chitral Campaign. Being a record of a journey through the outlying districts of Bosnia and the Herzegovina, and a comparison of their present condition with the condition they were in before they were occupied by Austria in 1878.

The Life of Admiral Tryon will be published by Messrs. Blackwood on Monday next. Rear-Admiral Fitzgerald has had the assistance of Lady Tryon in writing the biography. Tryon's naval career began in 1848 on board the Wellesley, and everyone knows that it ended in the Victoria disaster. His life then covered a period during which war-ships were completely reconstructed and naval tactics revolutionised.

UNDER the title of British Moralists Mr. L. A. Selby-Bigge has prepared for publication by the Clarendon Press, in 2 vols., a series of selections from writers principally of the eighteenth century. Among the moralists represented are Shaftesbury, Hutcheson, Butler, Adam Smith, Bentham, Samuel Clarke, Balguy, and Richard Price; and extracts are given from Hobbes, Locke, Cudworth, Wollaston, Brown, J. Clarke, Paley, and others.

MR. EDWIN PUGH, who has done good work in the magazines, will shortly publish a novel upon which he has been at work for nearly two years. The book will be issued by Mr. Heinemann on the 15th inst., under the fanciful title of The Man of Straw. Mr. Pugh's earlier book, A Street in Suburbia, consisted of a series of sketches descriptive of life and its actualities in a London suburb. The Man of Straw is an attempt to portray the life of the modern City clerk.

THE title of Olive Schreiner's new story, to be published by Mr. T. Fisher Unwin, is Trooper Peter Halket of Mashonaland.

MR. HENLEY's Anthology of English Lyrics will be published by Messrs. Methuen next month.

THE BOOK MARKET.

WHAT AMERICA READS.

THE American Bookman prints, in an excellent and varied February number, nearly thirty lists supplied to it by American booksellers, which show what books are most in demand on the other side of the Atlantic. We take the liberty of printing ten of these lists. They are worth study, for they show the hold which British books have obtained over the American reading public. This is a greater hold than can be realised by any one who does not see from week to week, and month to month, the American critical papers and also the magazines, the "Chap-books," and the "Fly-leaves," that flutter down like punctual migrants on London editors' tables. These are American in form. Their paper and type, their tout ensemble are American; but they open on the names and extracts which we were all reading a fortnight ago. The hand is the hand of Esau, but the voice is the voice of Jacob. And the wonder grows that a nation of eager readers should be depending so largely for its entertainment upon the writers of another nation, even allowing for the unity of speech that exists between England and America. Never, certainly, has one country supplied another with new literature at the rate and in the volume that England is supplying the United States. Never has one country fastened on and studied the current literature of another country with the generous eagerness of America buying the literature of England. Observe, we are speaking strictly of current literature. The devotion of Americans to our classics is devotion to what is their own. The astonishing thing is, that American readers look to England for ephemeral as well as classical literature. Over there, the book of the hour and the book of the century are alike English. One understands why Shakespeare has not been ousted by an American genius; but why is there so much room for Ian Maclaren and Mr. Barrie? Why, moreover, is no literary happening in London, no bubble reputation, no quarrel of author and publisher, no rivalries of editors, no personal peculiarity of a second rank writer too remote or trivial to be paragraphed with gusto in New York, Boston, and Philadelphia? We write broadly; not forgetting American writers, but rather remembering them with compassion. For surely the lists printed by the Bookman compel compassion for the American story-writer who remains in America. Ah, but how seldom he does remain there! Mr. Henry James, and Mr. Marion Crawford, and Mr. Harold Frederic, and Mr. Bret Harte, and Mark Twain, and John Oliver Hobbes are all in Europe!

The Bookman lists number twenty-five (not counting three from Canada), and of these the ten we print are fair samples. Examining, however, not the ten, but the whole twenty-five, we reach some interesting results.

The six British books reported as selling best in America are as follows:

TITLE.	NUMBER OF TIMES MENTIONED.
Kate Carnegie	19
Sentimental Tommy	18
The Seven Seas	9
Margaret Ogilvy	7
The Seats of the Mighty	3
Days of Auld Lang Syne	3
	59

The six American books reported as selling best in America are as follows:

TITLE.	NUMBER OF TIMES MENTIONED.
King Noanett	9
That First Affair	4
The Country of the Pointed Firs	4
The Hon. Peter Sterling	4
Marm Lisa	3
A Child World	3
	27

It thus appears that twenty-five representative booksellers in the United States, when asked to state what books they are selling best, have named six British books fifty-nine times, and six American books twenty-seven times.

But beyond this each bookseller was also asked to write down his six best-selling books in the order of their popularity. We proceed to form the following table:

A British book ranks first	in 16 lists
" " second	" 13 "
" " third	" 13 "
	42
An American books ranks first	in 9 lists
" " second	" 12 "
" " third	" 12 "
	33

Here again the striking predominance of British books is illustrated.

A singular fact is that while Kate Carnegie is declared to be the most popular book in the States, the leading American critical paper, The Critic, finds the story disappointing, says that Ian Maclaren has been defeated by success, and epitomises thus: "Kate Carnegie is a jaded book." Still, it heads the list.
